

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

Becoming Historical

The historical consciousness that emerged from the revolutionary break with tradition at the turn of the nineteenth century shaped the development of new forms of personal and collective identity. This book examines the stages and conflicts in this process of “becoming historical” through the works of prominent Prussian artists and intellectuals (Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Felix Mendelssohn, Jacob Grimm, Friedrich Karl von Savigny, Leopold von Ranke) who attached their personal visions to the reformist agenda of the Prussian regime that took power in 1840. The historical account of the evolution of analogous and interrelated commitments to a cultural reformation that would create communal solidarity through subjective identification with public memory is framed by the philosophical perspectives on historical selfhood provided by both the spokesperson for Prussian cultural politics – F. W. J. Schelling – and his radical critics – Karl Marx and Soren Kierkegaard – thus drawing this story of building selves and communities in early nineteenth-century Berlin into current debates about historically determined and contingently constructed identities.

John Edward Toews is Professor of History at the University of Washington. He is the author of Hegelianism: The Path Toward Dialectical Humanism, 1805–1841 (Cambridge: 1981) as well as numerous articles in scholarly journals. He also is the editor of The Communist Manifesto: By Karl Marx and Frederick Engels with Related Documents (New York: 1999).

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

BECOMING HISTORICAL

Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

JOHN EDWARD TOEWS

University of Washington

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

PUBLISHED BY THE PRESS SYNDICATE OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE
The Pitt Building, Trumpington Street, Cambridge, United Kingdom

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

The Edinburgh Building, Cambridge CB2 2RU, UK

40 West 20th Street, New York, NY 10011-4211, USA

477 Williamstown Road, Port Melbourne, VIC 3207, Australia

Ruiz de Alarcón 13, 28014 Madrid, Spain

Dock House, The Waterfront, Cape Town 8001, South Africa

<http://www.cambridge.org>

© John Edward Toews 2004

This book is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 2004

Printed in the United States of America

Typeface Bembo 11/12 pt. System L^AT_EX 2_ε [TB]

A catalog record for this book is available from the British Library.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Toews, John Edward.

Becoming historical : cultural reformation and public memory in early-nineteenth-century
Berlin / John Edward Toews.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-521-83648-4

1. Historiography – Germany – Berlin – History – 19th century.
2. Historicism. 3. Berlin (Germany) – Intellectual life – 19th century. I. Title.

DD86.T64 2004

907'.2'043155 – dc22 2003065413

ISBN 0 521 83648 4 hardback

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

For Julia and Jonathan

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More informationContents

List of Illustrations	xi
Preface	xv
Acknowledgments	xxiii

Philosophical Prologue: Historical Ontology and Cultural Reformation: Schelling in Berlin, 1841–1845 I

Part I Historicism in Power: 1840 and the Historical Turn in Prussian Cultural Politics

- 1 Nation, Church, and the Politics of Historical Identity: Frederick William IV's Vision of Cultural Reformation 19
 - Becoming German: Actualizing the Spirit of 1813 26
 - Ethnic Fraternity and the Patriarchal Ethos 42
 - Earthly Communities and the Transcendent Father: The Religious Dimension in Historicizing Identity 53
- 2 "Redeemed Nationality": Christian Bunsen and the Transformation of Ethnic Peoples into Ethical Communities Under the Guidance of the Historical Principle 67
 - The Original Project: Universal History, German Identity, and the Prussian Mission 69
 - The Project Revised: Transcendent Intervention and the Protestant Mission 76
 - The Project in Exile: The Seductions of Power and the Fragmentation of Vision 81
 - Triumph and Disillusionment: Collective Memory and the Church of the Future 97

Part II Architectural and Musical Historicism: Aesthetic Education and Cultural Reformation

- 3 Building Historical Identities in Space and Stone: Schinkel's Search for the Shape of Ethical Community 117
 - Collective Emancipation and Self-Recognition: The Cathedral of National Liberation and the Gothic Shape of Germanic Identity 120

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

viii

Contents

- The Temple of Aesthetic Education: The Tutelary State and the Discipline of Civic Culture 141
- A Community of Historical Meaning for Commerce and Labor: The Bauakademie as a Hymn to Historical Self-Making 161
- Constructed Identities and Transcendent Authority: Building Churches and Building the Nation 179
- Schinkel's Heritage in the 1840s: Fragments of a New Historicism 197
- 4 The Generation of Ethical Community from the Spirit of Music: Mendelssohn's Musical Constructions of Historical Identity 207
- Mendelssohn's Call to Berlin and the Contextual Frame of His Musical Mission 207
- Remembering the Past as the Essence of the Present: The Reformation Symphony as an Experiment in Instrumental Sacred Music 215
- The Spirit in the World and Against the World: Paulus and the Historical Actualization of the Idea 236
- Revelation and Enlightenment: Identifying with the Father's Voice 244
- Public Memory, Personal Memory, and the Autonomy of Art: Mendelssohn After 1840 258
- Part III Law, Language, and History: Cultural Identity and the Self-Constituting Subject in the Historical School
- 5 The Tension Between Immanent and Transcendent Subjectivity in the Historical School of Law: From Savigny to Stahl 281
- From Volksgemeinschaft to State and Religion: Transformations of Savigny's Legal Historicism, 1815–1840 283
- Theory and Practice: Historical Contexts of Savigny's Transformations of Historicism 292
- The Turn to Transcendent Authority: Stahl's Subordination of Jurisprudence to Theology 306
- 6 The Past as a Foreign Home: Jacob Grimm and the Relation Between Language and Historical Identity 318
- Past and Present: Jacob Grimm in Berlin 1841 318
- Recovering the Archaic Origins of Native Culture: Reading the Poesie of the People 326
- Excavating the Structures of Mediation: Language and Law in the Building of Historical Community 341
- Ethical Community and Transcendent Meaning: In Search of Germanic Religion in the 1830s 351
- Historicism as Linguistic Archaeology: Language as the Site of Historical Identity 361

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More informationContents

ix

- 7 Ranke and the Christian–German State: Contested Historical Identities and the Transcendent Foundations of the Historical Subject 372
- The Personal Dimension: Motherland and Fatherland 374
- The Political Dimension: Volk and State 380
- The Religious Dimension: Pantheism, Personalism, and Historical Freedom 393
- History as the “Unveiling of Existence”: Historical Subjectivity and Transcendent Authority 404
- Antiphilosophical Epilogue: Historicizing Identity in Kierkegaard and Marx, 1841–1846 419
- The Question of Historical Existence in Early Marx and Kierkegaard 419
- The Origins of Historical Selfhood: Human Existence as Desire and Labor 421
- The Reflective Ego as a Constituted Self and a Denial of Historical Selfhood 424
- Becoming Historical: The “Leap” and the “Revolution” as Transitions from Constituted to Constituting Selfhood 432
- Index* 441

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More informationList of Illustrations

1. Frederick William IV's visions of a Protestant basilica in the Lustgarten at the center of Berlin. Top: Sketch from the mid-1820s. Bottom: Rendering for the king by Friedrich August Stueler in 1842. Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz. 58
2. Mentors for Bunsen's concept of historical identity: frontispieces for volumes 1 and 5 of his Aegypten's Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, 1845 and 1857. 112
3. Friedrich Gilly's drawing of a projected monument to Frederick the Great on the Potsdamer Platz in Berlin (1797). Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv preussischer Kulturbesitz. 119
4. Schinkel's oil painting of an imaginary Gothic cathedral (1811). Reproduction permission: Stiftung Preussischer Schloesser und Gaerten, Berlin-Brandenburg; photo Joerg P. Anders. 124
5. Frontal perspective of Schinkel's planned Cathedral of Liberation. Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz; photo Joerg P. Anders. 128
6. Side view of Schinkel's planned Cathedral of Liberation. Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz; photo Joerg P. Anders. 130
7. Completing the Gothic after military victory. Schinkel's oil painting Medieval City on a River (1815). Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz. 132
8. Schinkel's imaginary reconstruction of Milan cathedral (ca. 1805–11). Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz; photo Joerg P. Anders. 133
9. Schinkel's sketch for a projected war memorial (ca. 1815). Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz; photo Joerg P. Anders. 134
10. Schinkel's design for a war memorial on the Kreuzberg in Berlin. Source: Schinkel: Sammlung Architektonische Entwuerfe, no. 22. Reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 138
11. Main façade of the Altes Museum. Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwuerfe, no. 39, reproduced from facsimile in

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

xii

List of Illustrations

- Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 145
12. Upper balcony of the main staircase of the Altes Museum with a view through the colonnade into the Lustgarten. Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwürfe, no. 43, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 146
13. Transverse section of the Altes Museum (detail). Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwürfe, no. 40, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 147
14. Schinkel's oil painting View of the Blossoming of Greece, displaying the building of culture after military victory (1825) (1836 copy by Wilhelm Ahlborn). Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz. 153
15. Schinkel's 1823 drawing of the projected Altes Museum in the context of the Lustgarten ensemble as viewed from Unter den Linden. Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz; photo Joerg P. Anders. 154
16. Reimagining 1815 in the context of Prussian military leadership: Schinkel's oil painting Triumphal Arch (1817). Reproduction permission: Stiftung Preussischer Schloesser und Gaerten, Berlin-Brandenburg; photo Joerg P. Anders. 158
17. Design for a memorial to Frederick the Great in the Lustgarten, between the Royal Palace and the cathedral (1829). Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwürfe, no. 167, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 159
18. Schinkel's drawing of a planned retail mall on Unter den Linden (1827). Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz; photo Joerg P. Anders. 165
19. Schinkel's engraving of the Packhof from the Palace Bridge with the Arsenal on the right and the Altes Museum on the left. Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwürfe, no. 149, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 166
20. Main façade of the Bauakademie, showing five of the eight bays and the two entrances. Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwürfe, no. 121, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 169

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More informationList of Illustrations

xiii

21. Schinkel's designs for the terra-cotta panels under the first-floor windows of the Bauakademie. The engraving shows only seven of the eight sets (the set for the fifth bay, with Pallas Athene, is missing), and they are not in the order in which they were finally placed on the building. From top to bottom, the sequence of the constructed panels is 4, 1, 2, 3, 7, 6, 8 (left to right on the four sides of the building). Moreover, the third panel in set 6 was exchanged with the first panel of set 8 in the final placement. Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwuerfe, no. 118, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 170
22. Designs for the portals and doors of the Bauakademie. Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwuerfe, no. 120, 122, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 173
23. Schinkel's drawing of the Bauakademie as seen from the Palace Bridge with the towers of the Friedrich Werder Church in the background. Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwuerfe, no. 115, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 176
24. Side view of the projected Saint Gertrude's Church on the Spittalmarkt. Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwuerfe, no. 32, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 182
25. Cross-sectional drawings of the final design of the Friedrich Werder Church. Source: Schinkel, Sammlung Architektonische Entwuerfe, no. 87, reproduced from facsimile in Karl Friedrich Schinkel, Collection of Architectural Designs (New York: Princeton Architectural Press, 1989). 185
26. Complete panoramic view of the plan for a ruler's residence, from Schinkel's Lehrbuch, 1835. Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz. 192
27. Drawing of a projected palace for King Otto of Greece on the Acropolis in Athens (detail). Reproduction permission: Staatliche Graphische Sammlung, Munich. 195
28. Drawing for a part of the projected Villa Orianda in the Crimea, with a museum of classical antiquities and a neoclassical temple. Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz. 196

29. Wilhelm Stier's design for a national cathedral on the Lustgarten, 1842. Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz. 199
30. Stueler and Frederick William IV's plan for a cultural acropolis in Berlin, 1841. Top: Side view from the Spree, showing the footbridge joining the Altes Museum and the Neues Museum. Bottom: Frontal view from the Lustgarten with unobstructed view of the Neues Museum on the left (Altes Museum removed). Reproduction permission: Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz. 201
- 31/32. The musical subject as historical citation: the opening andante and transition to the allegro of the Reformation Symphony. Source: Reproduced from the Gregg Press facsimile edition of the Werke (Leipzig: Breitkopf and Haertel, 1874–77). 222
33. Instrumental sacred music: the transition from aria to chorale in the Reformation Symphony. Source: Reproduced from the Gregg Press facsimile edition of the Werke (Leipzig: Breitkopf and Haertel, 1874–77). 226
34. Paul's call to conversion by the transcendent divinity in Paulus. Source: Reproduced from the Gregg Press facsimile edition of the Werke (Leipzig: Breitkopf and Haertel, 1874–77). 242
35. The initial proclamation of the hymnic motif (the "idea") in the Lobgesang Symphony Cantata. Source: Reproduced from the Gregg Press facsimile edition of the Werke (Leipzig: Breitkopf and Haertel, 1874–77). 251
36. The Father's proclamation (the oboes) integrated into the communal chorale and confronted by the romantic subject (strings). From the Lobgesang scherzo. Source: Reproduced from the Gregg Press facsimile edition of the Werke (Leipzig: Breitkopf and Haertel, 1874–77). 254
37. The musical narrative of crisis and conversion in the Lobgesang. Source: Reproduced from the Gregg Press facsimile edition of the Werke (Leipzig: Breitkopf and Haertel, 1874–77). 257
38. Speaking in God's voice? Elijah's curse on his people. Source: Reproduced from the Gregg Press facsimile edition of the Werke (Leipzig: Breitkopf and Haertel, 1874–77). 273

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

Preface

This book originated in a vague curiosity about the cultural significance and consequences of what appeared to be a minor historical event – the death of Frederick William III of Prussia and the accession to the throne of his son Frederick William IV, in June 1840. From my earlier investigations into the various contexts that shaped the evolution of Hegelianism and especially the Prussian Hegelian School, I was aware that the Prussian dynastic change had instigated a “new course” in academic politics. The new king, who fancied himself something of an intellectual and artist, was aligned with the academic opponents of Hegelianism and quickly used his powers of appointment to give his antipathies and sympathies public visibility and public force. Friedrich Karl von Savigny, the founder of the Historical School of Law, was appointed to a cabinet post as minister of justice in charge of preparing new legislative proposals, Leopold Ranke became the official Prussian state historiographer, Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm were invited to pursue their national project of compiling an historical German dictionary at the Prussian Academy of Sciences, and Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph Schelling was lured from Munich to Berlin as the publicly anointed philosophical spokesman for the metaphysical faith that animated the cultural program of the new regime. Frederick William IV began his reign with an agenda for a cultural “reformation” that would negate the threat of political “revolution.” At the core of this agenda was what he and his intellectual allies described as the “historical principle,” the implications of which resonated far beyond the squabbles between members of the Hegelian School and the Historical School at the university. The new course in Prussian cultural politics represented a programmatic attempt to redefine membership in various communities – religious, ethnic, ethical, and political – as historical identifications, that is, in terms of the subjective identification of individuals with a shared past or public memory.

My curiosity intensified and focused as I tried to clarify to myself the meaning of this cultural project of creating community through historical identification. One could clearly argue that the Prussian “new course” after 1840 was a minor incident in Prussian and German history. The reform agenda turned out to be rife with internal contradictions, and most of the cultural celebrities that were called together to give it intellectual and aesthetic substance had either died or retreated in disillusionment from their public commitments by 1845–46. For many of the individuals drawn to

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

xvi

Preface

Berlin to participate in the cultural politics of the new regime, the dynastic change of 1840 and its aftermath was more of an episode than a turning point. Yet this brief historical moment, in which so many important proponents of the historical principle in a diversity of cultural fields and disciplines were gathered together under the aegis of the programmatic vision of Prussia's political leadership, does provide an illuminating focal point for an examination of the cultural and historical meaning of that principle itself, and especially for the complex relationship between the cultivation of historical consciousness, or historical mindedness, and the construction of personal and communal identities. What were the affinities in historical and cultural viewpoint that produced this affiliation among such a diverse group of intellectuals, scholars, and artists? What were the perspectives and motivations that led the new king and some of his advisors to seek out these particular individuals and imagine them as the appropriate spokespersons for their cultural agenda? How did the brief affiliation of the 1840s reveal and transform the apparent affinities that had promoted and encouraged its creation? Was it merely a coincidence that two path-breaking, historically resonant, and prophetic conceptions of what it meant to live human existence in the form of historical selfhood – those of Marx and Kierkegaard – emerged, at least in part, as critical responses to this wide-ranging attempt to construct a cultural politics for historicizing identity in Berlin during the early 1840s?

Questions like this quickly led me to foreground what had been background and direct my attention beyond an examination of a particular stage in the evolution of the internal structure and external relations of a narrowly defined academic historicism. The texts and contexts of Ranke and Savigny, two individuals always prominently included in discussions of German historicism, were my first objects of analysis, but they were soon connected to a broader synchronic examination of the ways in which questions of historical self-consciousness and historical identity were addressed and represented across a variety of cultural areas and “languages.” I became more interested, for example, in how Ranke's conception of human existence as essentially historical was related to representations of human historicity in the architecture of Schinkel, the musical compositions of Mendelssohn, and the linguistic-ethnographic studies of Jacob Grimm, than in how his epistemological arguments and historical narratives helped produce and nurture specific forms of historical research, understanding, and representation within the disciplinary discourse and academic institutions of a peculiarly German tradition of historical scholarship. This is not to say that the latter issues do not interest me or that I completely ignore them in my analysis, but simply that I tend to subordinate them to questions about the nature and implications of conceiving human existence as historical existence, questions that Ranke shared with individuals like Schinkel, Mendelssohn, and Grimm, who were working in different disciplines, disciplinary languages, and cultural media. I do not perceive the patterns of argument and representation

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More informationPreface

xvii

that developed in architecture and music as simply a reflection of arguments and representations developed in the textually oriented academic disciplines of jurisprudence, history, and philology. Instead, I assume that spatial and tonal representations of what it means, personally and collectively, to be and to become historical entered into this “conversation” among Prussian historicizers as independent interventions with their own messages to pervey. Within the framework of this study, inclusion in the conversation about “becoming historical” simply requires belief that human existence is essentially historical and that questions about personal, communal, and religious identity must be addressed within this ontological framework.¹

The inclusion of extended sections on Schinkel and Mendelssohn within this study was a bit of a professional stretch for me and added years to the project. It became clear as I began to examine the perspectives of the major political instigators of the Prussian program for cultural reformation according to the “historical principle” that architecture and music played critical roles in their conceptions of historical identity. Frederick William IV actually preferred to think through and articulate his vision of cultural reform in architectural terms. Even though Schinkel died during the first months of his reign, the king’s close personal association with Schinkel and with Schinkel’s various public projects between 1815 and 1840 was an important factor in shaping the cultural politics of the regime after 1840. I selected Christian Bunsen, the king’s close personal advisor and cultural consultant, for extended treatment because the development of Bunsen’s own perspectives ranged across the areas of historical scholarship, archaeology, linguistics, music, and architecture and suggested some of the ways in which these various cultural dimensions might fit together in a program of cultural reformation. Both the king and Bunsen were in full agreement in pursuing a state appointment for Mendelssohn after 1840 that would place him in the charge not only of ecclesiastical music but also of musical education and public musical performance in Prussia. In many ways the shaping of historical consciousness through spatial organization and musical performance was more influential in the broader spheres of public life, in terms of both cultural representation and ethical and cultural education, than the production of scholarly texts and academic lectures. Certainly I found that devoting so much attention to Schinkel and Mendelssohn enriched my own conceptions of the meaning of historicism and the project of becoming historical.

¹ For the most influential account of historicism as the theory and method of historical knowledge and historical writing within the disciplinary matrix of the German academic tradition, see Georg G. Iggers, The German Conception of History: The National Tradition of Historical Thought from Herder to the Present (rev. ed.; Middletown, CT, 1983), but also Joern Ruesen, Konfigurationen des Historismus: Studien zur deutsche Wissenschaftskultur (Frankfurt: 1993); Annette Wittkau, Historismus: Zur Geschichte des Begriffs und des Problems (Goettingen: 1992); and Friedrich Jaeger and Joern Ruesen, Geschichte des Historismus: Eine Einfuehrung (Munich: 1992).

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

xviii

Preface

Although the overall structure of this study is synchronic, its chapters share a common narrative structure. My aim was to re-create the paths that led individuals operating in different areas of culture to the particular perspective they possessed in 1840 and which made their affiliation in a common project possible, even though this affiliation may have been ephemeral and in some cases grounded at least partially in misrecognition. In crude preliminary outline, this meta-story, or ideal-typical narrative that informs the particular stories of the individual chapters, proceeds as follows. The starting point for the development of the historical consciousness of this generation was a belief that human identity was defined by participation in a spontaneously evolving, unique, ethno-cultural organism whose unifying and dynamic core was a particular life principle, “genius,” or “idea” that articulated its presence as an incommensurable individuality in the production of language, ritual, myth, and customary patterns of social interaction. The purposive tendency in this development was from unconscious “natural” ethnic identity to self-conscious voluntary “ethical” identification. Religious and political institutions nurtured and cultivated cultural identity as a consciously chosen, self-imposed identification, but developed, unless artificially blocked in some fashion, from the archaic unity embodied in the “idea” in its preconscious form. The constitution of this belief, or the revelation of this historical reality, occurred for many literate and educated Germans in the twenty or so years between the beginnings of the French occupation of the Rhineland in the mid 1790s and the wars of liberation against the Napoleonic hegemony in 1813–15.² In particular, the national enthusiasm that accompanied the campaigns of 1813 was imagined as a critical, transformative moment of self-recognition, when Germans sloughed off the blinders of ahistorical consciousness and finally recognized themselves as members of a shared and uniquely individual German culture whose ² During the 1980s, there was extensive scholarly debate about the continuities and discontinuities between conceptions of historical existence and historical knowledge in the German Enlightenment, or even earlier periods, and the construction of Romantic historicism around the turn of the century. Most of the major participants in this debate are represented in the conference anthology: Aufklärung und Geschichte: Studien zur deutschen Geschichtswissenschaft im 18. Jahrhundert, eds., Hans Erich Boedeker, Georg G. Iggers, Jonathan B. Knudson, and Peter H. Reill (Goettingen: 1986); but see also Horst Walter Blanke and Joern Ruesen, Von der Aufklärung zum Historismus: zum Strukturwandel des historischen Denkens (Paderborn: 1984). The German discussion echoed debates about the relations between the peculiarly German form of Romantic historicism that was tied to the nationalist tradition prior to 1945 and the critical, social-scientific paradigms that emerged in the 1960s. In the mid 1990s Frank Ankersmit and Iggers debated this issue in a forum of the journal History and Theory, in the context of discussions about the philosophical and cultural implications of the “new historicism” that had emerged in Anglo-American academe in the 1980s: “The Meaning of Historicism and Its Relevance for Contemporary Theory,” History and Theory 34 (1995): 143–73. My own work investigates the meaning of historicism less through its origins than through its fate after 1815 and focuses on the development of a stereoscopic vision of historical identity which, I believe, speaks in more interesting ways to the concerns of the present than the Romantic historicism of the turn of the century.

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More informationPreface

xix

history revealed and actualized its essence. The production of historical representations was meant to nurture and maintain this historical consciousness that had emerged in the German “awakening.” I will refer to this model of historical identification through the shorthand of Romantic historicism at various points in the text.

It is important to recognize that the historicism of 1840 was not synonymous with the Romantic historicism I have just described. In fact, between 1815 and 1840, the original paradigm of ethno-cultural historical identity had revealed its inner tensions and begun to break apart. This process was marked first of all by experiences of disillusionment concerning the spontaneous evolution of a shared ethno-cultural essence into freely and self-consciously affirmed membership in an ethical community. The rejection of any necessary development of ethnic identity into ethical-political identity by the Congress of Vienna in 1814–15, the repression of the national movement in 1819–24, the apparent evolution of the ethnic “people” into an anarchic mass of individual egos as revealed by the social disturbances and political unrest of the early 1830s, all operated as moments, experienced with various weight in the lives of different individuals, in this fragmentation of the cultural paradigm of Romantic historicism. The result was that the transition from ethnicity to ethical life became a problem and a task that demanded specific and contingent action, rather than simply an immanent, necessary self-determination of the “idea.” The spheres of politics and religion were no longer imagined as sites for the self-conscious expression of a prior, unconscious, primal identity, but as autonomous sites with transcendent foundations where acts of historical transformation through cultural reformation could find motivational support. To recognize oneself as historical, both as an individual and as a member of a group, now gained an added dimension. To recognize oneself as historical was to understand and live both personal identity and collective identity as historically constituted, as produced in and by the process of history itself. But the constituted historical self was itself a product of cultural institutions and relations that had been constructed by the acts of individuals operating in obedience to self-imposed transcendent determinations. To become historical in the sense of recognizing that personal and communal identity were historically constituted was also to take upon oneself the obligation of constituting oneself, personally and collectively, in historical action. In this sense Marx’s German Ideology and Kierkegaard’s Unscientific Postscript (both written in 1845–46) cut to the quick of the historicist project of the 1840s and provide an appropriate conclusion to its implicit narrative structure.

Two dimensions of this framing narrative emerged as especially striking and important and are highlighted in the synchronic stories of the individual chapters. The first is the transformation of the shape of religious belief from a predominantly “pantheistic” form of faith in the immanent workings of divine purpose within the patterns of historical evolution to a predominantly

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

xx

Preface

“personalistic” belief in a transcendent divinity, a belief that could function as the source of historical actions that might intervene in the immanent development of the ethno-cultural subject, or “idea,” and change its historical trajectory. The complex shift from immanent to transcendent models of religious and philosophical faith, combined with concurrent changes in ways of conceiving relations between church and state, and between religious piety and national identification, play a role in my analysis that I had not expected as I began this project. Second, I became increasingly aware that this shift away from the Romantic model of becoming historical during the 1820s and 1830s was also marked by a change in interpreting sociopolitical relations that could be crudely described as a move from a fraternal to a patriarchal model. Processes of group formation were conceived less as reciprocal identification among group members themselves (a band of brothers) and more as identification with the father as the internalized historical essence of the group. It took me a long time to grasp, or perhaps accept, what now seems to me to be almost too obvious to mention: that the transition toward what we conventionally refer to as “Victorian” piety and patriarchy was not simply a conservative historical “regression” to “throne and altar” traditions, but a central element in the complex development of the consciousness of what it meant to be historical in the middle decades of the nineteenth century (and thus of great theoretical importance in the attempt to understand “historicism” and the project of becoming historical).

The chapters that follow were not written in their current order and because of the synchronic rather than diachronic organization of the book need not be read in sequence. However, there is logic to the book’s organization, and an implicit conceptual narrative in its structure. The “Philosophical Prologue” opens the book with a discussion of historical ontology, examining the claim that the essential nature of human existence, and in fact all “being,” is historical through a presentation of the programmatic public lectures Schelling delivered in Berlin in the fall of 1841. This introduces the main theme of the book in its most abstract philosophical form. Part I contains two chapters that follow the paths taken by Frederick William IV and his advisor Christian Bunsen toward formulation of a vision of cultural reformation according to historicist principles, a vision they would attempt to actualize in the cultural politics of the Prussian regime after 1840 and which informed their attempts to gather Germany’s historicist luminaries around the court at Berlin. Part II takes up the question of historical identity as it was given public shape in architecture, urban planning, musical composition, and musical performance, and analyzes the problematic character of the relationship of Schinkel and Mendelssohn to the program of 1840. Part III focuses on three scholar-theorists who are conventionally tagged as founding members of the Historical School – Savigny, Jacob Grimm, and Ranke – and examines the ways in which their

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

Preface

xxi

affiliation with the Prussian regime in 1840 revealed the nature of their evolution as scholars of history and proponents of historical identity. Each of these chapters examines the problematic development from ethnic (historically constituted) to ethical (historically self-constituting) models of identity and the role played by transcendent religious principles in this development. The “Antiphilosophical Epilogue” draws out some of the implications of the project of becoming historical as given classic and historically prophetic form by Marx and Kierkegaard in 1840–46.

This book does not contain a formal bibliography. The historical and critical literature on the individual figures treated is vast and often distinguished, and I have tried to indicate my debts and disagreements in the footnotes. My general perspective on the emergence of the historical principle as a dominant cultural form during the watershed period of the early nineteenth century has been shaped in part by the comments on various historical forms of conceiving time in Reinhart Koselleck’s Futures Past,³ but especially by the enigmatic comments of Michel Foucault about the emergence of the modern discourse of historicist humanism as an inwardly conflicted “analytic of finitude” in which human identity was figured as both constituted by the “positivities” of historical culture and constitutive of the historical worlds in which it was constituted.⁴ The more recent writings of Stephen Bann, James Chandler, and Susan Crane⁵ have been especially useful in helping me to think about Romantic historicism as both a form of historical consciousness differentiating past and present and a complex set of strategies for the production of historical representations that extended far beyond the confines of the narrative texts of historians. The burgeoning scholarly literature on the historical production of national identity and cultural memory has only added to my belief that historicism is more than a form of historiography, a particular type of historical representation. My own contribution to this scholarly conversation has been to emphasize the wide-ranging transformation of Romantic historicism in the late 1820s and 1830s and draw out some of its implications, especially regarding problems of historical agency, identity construction, and ethical choice, which were ³ Reinhart Koselleck, Futures Past: On the Semantics of Historical Time, transl. Keith Tribe (Cambridge, Mass.: 1985).

⁴ Michel Foucault, The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences (New York: 1971), pp. 217–21, 312–22, 367–73.

⁵ Stephen Bann, Romanticism and the Rise of History (New York: 1995); James Chandler, England in 1819: The Politics of Literary Culture and the Case of Romantic Historicism (Chicago: 1998); Susan Crane, Collecting and Historical Consciousness in Early Nineteenth-Century Germany (Ithaca: 2000). The literature on the construction of cultural memory also deals extensively with the broader cultural production of historical consciousness and the attempt to deal with historical discontinuities through the self-conscious production of historical identities. For a recent intelligent survey of the literature, see Peter Fritzsche, “The Case of Modern Memory,” Journal of Modern History 73 (March 2001): 87–117, and Peter Fritzsche, Specters of History: On Nostalgia, Exile, and Modernity,” American Historical Review 106, no. 5 (December 2001): 1587–1618.

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

xxii

Preface

so decisive in producing the affiliations among proponents of the historical principle in Berlin in 1840.

Throughout the writing of this historical study, I have also found myself persistently turning to problems of historical consciousness and historical identity within the frame of current academic and cultural debates.⁶ The “new” historicism of the last decades of the twentieth century seemed to share more than simply a name with the old historicisms of the early nineteenth century. However, I hope this study does not simply project contemporary concerns into its representation of the past. Like the historicists of the early nineteenth century, I have tried to conjure up a specific cultural world of the past in its historical difference – to allow my subjects to speak within the contexts of their own concerns. There are easier ways to look in a mirror or produce an echo than writing an historical study. I am convinced that it is precisely in their cultural and temporal difference, as voices from another place and time, that my subjects claim our attention as conversational partners and expand our horizons as we struggle to grasp the tensions and dilemmas of living our lives as both products and producers of history, and thus pursue our own version of the adventure of “becoming historical.”

⁶ My own attempts to articulate and clarify the relations between cultural identity and ethical action, between historical consciousness and narrative meaning, between constituted and constituting historical selfhood, within the frame of current academic and cultural discussions are presented in: “The Historian in the Labyrinth of Signs: Reconstructing Cultures and Reading Texts in the Practice of Intellectual History,” Semiotica 83 (winter 1991): 352–84; “A New Philosophy of History? Reflections on Postmodern Historicizing,” History and Theory 36 (1997): 236–48; “Historiography as Exorcism: Conjuring Up ‘Foreign’ Worlds and Historicizing Subjects in the Context of the Multi-Culturalism Debate,” Theory and Society 27 (1998): 535–64; “Salvaging Truth and Ethical Obligation from the Historicist Tide: Thomas Haskell’s Moderate Historicism,” History and Theory 38 (1999): 348–64; and “Linguistic Turn and Discourse Analysis in History,” International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, eds. Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes (26 vols.; Oxford: 2001), vol. 13, 8916–22.

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

Acknowledgments

The publication of this book marks the conclusion of a long, tangled, and often interrupted historical project. This project began in the mid and late 1980s with a very different focus and aim. For years it was placed on hold and almost abandoned as I pursued other interests in the history of psychoanalysis and contemporary historical and historiographical theory. In the mid 1990s my apparently irrepressible interest in the 1840s returned, but from a different angle, enriched (I hope) by my various detours and by a new interest in music and architecture. A more recent detour into the history of Marxism reinforced my conviction that the decade of the 1840s marked a significant turning point in European intellectual history and was particularly important in framing modern and postmodern conceptions of the historical subject and historical identity.

During the years I have worked on various pieces of this project and then labored to weave them together into a single story, I have been sustained by the encouragement and criticism of friends, colleagues, and students. I would like to thank the following colleagues who invited me to present parts of this project at various campuses around the country and thus also introduced me to critics I would not otherwise have encountered: Richard M. Buxbaum, Keith Baker, Michael Steinberg, David Sabeau, John McCole, Robert Nye, Anthony La Vopa, William Duvall, and Mark Micale. I would like to extend a special thanks to Carl Schorske and Stephen Bann for sending me encouraging letters (regarding the Mendelssohn chapter) at a time when I was particularly frustrated about the whole project. The three anonymous reviewers from Cambridge University Press helped me make the necessary revisions in the final stages, and Elke Schwichtenberg at the Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz was a godsend in smoothing out problems with the illustrations at the last minute. The research and original drafting for the Schinkel and Grimm chapters were completed while I was a Fellow at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences in Palo Alto, California, during the academic year 1996–97. The atmosphere of the center was perfect for healing academic burnout, and I am grateful for the financial support from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation that made that year possible. The Grimm chapter was shaped in part by my conversations with Kveta Benes, who completed her dissertation on the relationship between German academic philology and national identity under my direction during the late 1990s.

Cambridge University Press

0521836484 - Becoming Historical: Cultural Reformation and Public Memory in Early Nineteenth-Century Berlin

John Edward Toews

Frontmatter

More information

xxiv

Acknowledgments

Throughout the writing of this book I have been immersed in the experimental projects of an adventure in undergraduate education (the Comparative History of Ideas program [CHID]) at the University of Washington. My colleagues and students in this program may have taken up time that I could have spent on the research and writing of this project, but I would never have survived, intellectually or morally, without them. Thank you, Jim Clowes, and all the students, staff, and teaching assistants of CHID. The personal friendship of Eleanor Toews, Todd and Judy Coryell, Uta Poiger, Kyriacos Markianos, and Dorothee Wierling kept me sane.

This book is dedicated to my children Julia and Jonathan, whose passion for music, literature, and architecture shaped this project in ways they never imagined. Earlier versions of chapter 5 and of parts of chapters 3 and 4 have been previously published: “The Immanent Genesis and Transcendent Goal of Law: Savigny, Stahl and the Ideology of the Christian State,” The American Journal of Comparative Law 37 (winter), 1989: 139–69, republished by permission; “Musical Historicism and the Transcendental Foundations of Community: Mendelssohn’s Lobegesang and the ‘Christian-German’ Politics of Frederick William IV,” in Michael Roth, ed., Rediscovering History: Culture, Politics and the Psyche (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1994), pp. 183–201, copyright 1994 by the board of trustees of Leland Stanford University, by permission; and “Building Historical and Cultural Identities in a Modernist Frame: Karl Friedrich Schinkel’s Bauakademie in Context,” in Mark S. Micale and Robert L. Dietle, eds., Enlightenment, Passion, Modernity: Historical Essays in European Thought and Culture (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2000), pp. 167–206; copyright 2000 by the board of trustees of Leland Stanford University, by permission.