The Cambridge Companion to Sylvia Plath

The controversies that surround Sylvia Plath's life and work mean that her poems are more read and studied now than ever before. This Companion provides a comprehensive and authoritative overview of Sylvia Plath's poetry, prose, letters and journals and of their place in twentieth-century culture. These newly commissioned essays by leading international scholars represent a spectrum of critical perspectives. They pay particular attention to key debates and to well-known texts such as Ariel and The Bell Jar, while offering original and thought-provoking readings to new as well as more experienced Plath readers. The Companion also discusses three recent additions to the field: Ted Hughes's Birthday Letters, Plath's complete Journals and the 'Restored' edition of Ariel. With its invaluable guide to further reading and chronology of Plath's life and work, this Companion will help students and scholars understand and enjoy Plath's work and its continuing relevance.

NOTES ON CONTRIBUTORS

STEVEN GOULD AXELROD is Professor of English at the University of California, Riverside. He is the author of Sylvia Plath: The Wound and the Cure of Words (1990) and Robert Lowell: Life and Art (1978) and has co-written or edited many other books including Robert Lowell: Essays on the Poetry (1986), Critical Essays on Wallace Stevens (1988) and Critical Essays on William Carlos Williams (1995). He has published more than forty articles and is now researching a book-length study of Cold War poetry.

JANET BADIA is Assistant Professor of Twentieth-Century American Literature at Marshall University, Huntington, West Virginia. Her research interests include confessional poetry, autobiography and book history, especially the study of readers and reception. She is co-editor of Reading Women: Literary Figures and Cultural Icons from the Victorian Age to the Present (2005). She is currently completing a book manuscript on Plath, Anne Sexton and women readers.

TRACY BRAIN is Senior Lecturer in English and Creative Writing at Bath Spa University, where she runs the PhD in Creative Writing Programme. She is the author of The Other Sylvia Plath (2001). In addition to the essay in the present volume, Tracy Brain has recently written on Plath in Jo Gill (ed.), Modern Confessional Writing: New Critical Essays (2005) and in Anita Helle (ed.), The Unravelling Archive: Essays on Sylvia Plath (2006).

CHRISTINA BRITZOLAKIS is Senior Lecturer in English at the University of Warwick. She is the author of Sylvia Plath and the Theatre of Mourning (1999) and has published articles on modernist poetry, fiction and drama, including James Joyce, T. S. Eliot and W. H. Auden. Her current research is concerned with visuality and technology in international modernist culture.

NOTES ON CONTRIBUTORS

LYNDA K. BUNDTZEN is Herbert H. Lehman Professor of English at Williams College in Williamstown, Massachusetts. She is the author of two books on Sylvia Plath: Plath's Incarnations: Woman and the Creative Process (1983) and The Other Ariel (2001). Her other writings include several essays on film and feminist theory and on other women poets.

ALICE ENTWISTLE is Senior Lecturer in English at the University of the West of England, Bristol. She has published widely on late twentieth-century Anglo-American poetics, concentrating in recent years on poetry written by women. She is the author, with Jane Dowson, of A History of Twentieth Century British Women's Poetry (Cambridge University Press, 2005).

JO GILL is Lecturer in American Literature at Bath Spa University. She is the editor of Modern Confessional Writing: New Critical Essays (2005) and the author of a new study of the work of Anne Sexton. She has published extensively on modern British and American poetry.

DIANE MIDDLEBROOK is a professional writer and Professor of English Emerita at Stanford University, California. Among her books are Anne Sexton – A Biography (finalist for the 1991 National Book Award in the USA); Suits Me: The Double Life of Billy Tipton (1998) and Her Husband: Hughes and Plath – A Marriage (2003). Middlebrook is an Honorary Member of Christ's College, University of Cambridge.

DEBORAH NELSON is Associate Professor of English and Gender Studies at the University of Chicago where she has taught since 1996. Her first book, Pursuing Privacy in Cold War America (2001), examines confessional poetry in relation to Supreme Court privacy doctrine. She is currently working on a book called Tough Broads on women artists and intellectuals in the postwar era.

SUSAN R. VAN DYNE is Professor and Chair of Women's Studies at Smith College, Massachusetts. She is the author of Revising Life: Sylvia Plath's Ariel Poems (1993) and co-editor of Women's Place in the Academy: Transforming the Liberal Arts (1985). She is currently working on a book titled Proving Grounds: The Politics of Reading Contemporary Women Poets.

PREFACE

The Cambridge Companion to Sylvia Plath offers a critical overview of Plath's writing (predominantly the poetry, but also fiction, letters and journals) and of its place in twentieth-century literature and culture. The eleven specially commissioned essays in the collection are the work of leading international scholars in the field and represent a spectrum of critical perspectives and practices.

The book is divided into two sections. The first section discusses Plath's writing in relation to relevant contexts and perspectives (exploring the temptations and limitations of reading her work biographically, the insights to be gained by examining its historical and ideological contexts, the difficulties and rewards of adopting a psychoanalytic perspective and the influence of her writing on contemporary American and British poetry). The aim here is to show that Plath's work is not entire unto itself; that it emerged in particular historical, ideological, literary and personal contexts, and, moreover, that the figure of Plath we may think we know is a product of a complex, mutable and contested tissue of discourses. These essays combine a critical awareness of key issues and debates in Plath studies with incisive readings of the poetry and prose; their intention is to inform and to stimulate the reader's own engagement with the writing.

The second section discusses a range of Plath texts in turn – from her earliest collection The Colossus to the poems of the Ariel period to The Bell Jar and the manuscripts of Letters Home – raising a number of important and challenging issues, and proposing a variety of reading positions. This section is interested in both the diversity and the detail of Plath's work, in its richness, its craft and its technical complexity, and it focuses on Plath's concentrated and ambitious use of poetic form. It draws attention to its sometimes overlooked variety and it alerts readers to Plath's sustained manipulation of a range of genres and voices and her development of a sophisticated and linguistically self-aware poetics. It reflects on the publishing history of specific volumes and the construction of a Plath 'canon' and highlights recent critical debates about agency and ownership, about the politics of editing and the ethics of criticism. The essays in both sections are informed by an awareness of gender as a factor in the production and reception of Plath's work.

Like others in the series, the Companion to Plath draws on and – implicitly or otherwise – assesses previous scholarship in the field. This critical heritage is examined in detail, where relevant, in the chapters which follow (and a comprehensive list of sources is provided at the end of the book). Nevertheless a brief survey of the field of Plath studies is useful at this point as a way of setting the scene and of demonstrating, first, that approaches to Plath's work change over time and second, that there is no orthodoxy of critical opinion. Some of the earliest studies of Plath's writing – for example, C. B. Cox and A. R. Jones's 1964 article 'After the Tranquillized Fifties' and Al Alvarez's 1967 'Beyond all this Fiddle' – considered it in the context of the newly emergent 'confessional mode' of poetry (the name was coined by M. L. Rosenthal in a review of Robert Lowell's 1959 Life Studies) with which Plath – rightly or wrongly – was typically associated. Plath was an acquaintance of Lowell's, had studied alongside poet Anne Sexton in his Boston University writing workshops and seemed, particularly in the poems which culminated in Ariel, to belong within this frame. Such an association seems now to be rather limiting, although recent revisions of confessionalism in the light of, say, Michel Foucault's work and in the context of Deborah Nelson's reading of the mode as a product of Cold War anxieties about privacy and surveillance suggest the potential value of revisiting Plath's work in the light of a revised definition of the term.

Contemporaneous with this (and perhaps an inevitable consequence both of the turn to the personal and private in this period, and of the particular circumstances of Plath's death) were early and persistently influential biographical accounts. Memoirs by family and friends featured in Charles Newman's 1970 collection The Art of Sylvia Plath (which reproduced articles originally published in a 1966 special issue of the journal Tri-Quarterly). This was followed by Al Alvarez's recollections of Plath's last days, The Savage God (UK 1971/US 1972), and some years later by Anne Stevenson's controversial Bitter Fame – the latter ignited arguments about authority and ownership of truth which continue to smoulder to this day. A characteristic of such works – although we should note that this is not a problem unique to Plath studies – is a worrying conflation of poet and speaker, of lived experience and poetic text. Of late, more sophisticated treatments (Janet Malcolm's The Silent Woman (1994) and Jacqueline Rose's The Haunting of Sylvia Plath (1991), which she later supplemented with an essay entitled 'This is Not a Biography') take a step back and question the status, value and purpose of literary biography.

PREFACE

Another early approach to the study of Plath was through the lens of mythology. Judith Kroll, author of one of the first book-length studies of Plath's work, Chapters in a Mythology (1976), cites the profound influence on Plath (through Hughes) of Robert Graves's The White Goddess. Steven Gould Axelrod, however, demurs, arguing that 'Plath never actually cared much about The White Goddess except when she was feigning an interest in topics of interest to her husband' (Sylvia Plath: The Wound and the Cure of Words (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990), p. 46).

A psychoanalytical approach to Plath's life and writing seems always to have proved tempting. David Holbrook's Sylvia Plath: Poetry and Existence (1976) examines the poetry in the light of what it diagnoses as the poet's schizoid personality – a condition which Holbrook wishes to ameliorate or neutralize in order to protect her vulnerable readers: 'these works may be offering falsifications or forms of moral inversion which are absurd, or even deranged, and may even do harm to the sensitive and responsive young person' ((London: Athlone Press, 1976), p. 2). In the same year, Edward Butscher's contentious Sylvia Plath: Method and Madness appeared. More recent psychoanalytical accounts, for example Jacqueline Rose's The Haunting of Sylvia Plath, Elisabeth Bronfen's Sylvia Plath (1998) and Christina Britzolakis's Sylvia Plath and the Theatre of Mourning (1999), have developed a rather different approach, one inflected by the insights of post-structuralism and feminism. Here, as in contemporary literary studies more generally, the shift has been away from analysing and pathologizing the author to an acknowledgement of the uncertainty of truth, the slipperiness of language and the indeterminacy of the subject.

Plath's writing coincided with the emergence of the second wave of feminism and thus her work has frequently been read in terms of its recognition and representation of the conditions of life for women of the 1960s onwards. Studies by Alicia Ostriker, Jan Montefiore, Suzanne Juhasz and many others established Plath's importance in a newly validated tradition of women's writing. More recent feminist approaches have challenged some of the assumptions of such criticism. Renée Curry's thought-provoking account of representations of whiteness in modern women poets, White Women Writing White: H. D., Elizabeth Bishop, Sylvia Plath and Whiteness (2000), critiques the essentialism and the colour blindness of Plath's poetry.

Plath's historical context and her engagement with issues of political, cultural and ideological concern have often been overlooked in the enthusiasm for reading her work as merely private and introspective – as 'mirror-looking' to use her own scornful term (PS, p. 170). Stan Smith's important book Inviolable Voice: History and Twentieth-Century Poetry (1982) redresses this, seeing the poetry as located very much in a particular place and time, and as engaging in affirmatory or contestatory ways with large questions of history, society, responsibility. Deborah Nelson's reading of Plath and her contemporaries in the context of Cold War cultures of privacy and surveillance (Pursuing Privacy in Cold War America, 2001) and Robin Peel's study of Plath's preoccupation with the political anxieties of the 1950s and early 1960s (Writing Back: Sylvia Plath and Cold War Politics, 2002) have also proved influential. In each of these cases, Plath is read as a politically engaged poet. Like T. S. Eliot, W. H. Auden and others (Denise Levertov and Thom Gunn of her own generation), Plath shifted cultures by moving across the Atlantic. Of late, Tracy Brain and Paul Giles have read Plath's language and themes in terms of this dislocation (Brain posits the notion of mid-Atlanticism and draws attention to the equivocal or liminal voices of Plath's writing).

To all these must be added the numerous studies of Plath's work which, while sometimes drawing on some of the broad approaches outlined above, develop their own perspectives and areas of interest. These include major studies by Marjorie Perloff, Helen Hennessy Vendler, Tim Kendall, Linda Wagner-Martin, Lynda K. Bundtzen, Susan R. Van Dyne and many, many others. What is striking in summarizing this heritage is its breadth and its diversity. The Companion treads a confident path through this rich and heterogeneous material.

Of particular importance to this Companion – and thus of real value to its readers – has been the recent publication of three key texts. The Cambridge Companion to Sylvia Plath is the first study of Plath to be able to make use of all these resources. The first of these is Ted Hughes's 1998 collection of poems Birthday Letters. This revisits the life and, more importantly, the work of Plath, in poems such as 'The Rabbit Catcher', which writes back to her well-known and fiercely contested poem of the same name, and 'The Beach', which offers a different perspective on the scene explored in her 1961 'Whitsun'. It is too simplistic to say that this is Hughes's version of the story of their marriage, or that this is Hughes in dialogue with Plath (if we think it important to register the nuances of Plath's poetic voices and to flag up the noncoherence of poet and speaker, surely we should adopt a similar approach in considering Hughes's work?) Nevertheless, what Birthday Letters does do, in what I regard as a profoundly self-conscious, troubled and troubling way, is remind us of the shared difficulties – for writer and reader alike – of engaging with this material, with these issues. Analysing the complexity of their creative partnership is the approach Diane Middlebrook takes in her book Her Husband: Sylvia Plath and Ted Hughes – A Marriage (2003).

The second key text to emerge of late, in 2000, is the more complete edition of Plath's extant journals (known as The Journals of Sylvia Plath: 1950–1962 in the UK and The Unabridged Journals of Sylvia Plath in the US). Edited by Karen Kukil, the Associate Curator at Smith College, the new Journals reproduce for the first time Smith College's extensive holdings of Plath's diaries. Running to almost 700 pages, the Journals are hugely valuable to our understanding of Plath's writing practices and sources, although as Bonnie Costello cautions of the work of Marianne Moore 'this multiplicity of sources is quite different from the multiplicity of references' (Marianne Moore: Imaginary Possessions (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1981), p. 6).

PREFACE

Finally, what has been perceived by some as a troubling gap in Plath's oeuvre is closed by the publication of Ariel: The Restored Edition – A Facsimile of Plath's Manuscript, Reinstating Her Original Selection and Arrangement (2004) with a 'Foreword' by Frieda Hughes. As Ted Hughes disclosed in his 'Introduction' and 'Notes' to Plath's Collected Poems, the edition of Ariel which had been published posthumously in 1965 (UK/1966 US) did not follow the order, or even include all the poems, which Plath had planned (CP, pp. 14–15). The significance of Hughes's alterations to the trajectory of the volume are considered at length in Marjorie Perloff's 1990 article 'The Two Ariels: The (Re)making of the Sylvia Plath Canon' and Lynda K. Bundtzen's book The Other Ariel (2001).

In her 'Foreword' to the restored edition of Ariel, Frieda Hughes expresses concern about the repeated 'dissect[ion]' by readers of some of its key poems (her anxiety replicates Ted Hughes's own point, in defence of his editing of the 1965/66 version of Ariel, that he would have left more poems out had he suspected that they would ever be 'decoded' (WP, p. 167)). There is an anxiety in both of these cases about reading – about the power of other people's reading to yield unexpected, proliferating and uncontrollable meanings. Interpretation is experienced (or interpreted) as an attack on the hermetic body of the text, on the singular truth which is presumed to hide there. What I wish to argue here is that the text – Plath's poetry, any writing – cannot exist outside of such interpretative processes; it does not 'mean' alone. To suggest that it does is, arguably, to deny the complexity and richness of the writing, to reduce it to singularity. On this point I disagree with Frieda Hughes's suggestion that the Ariel poems 'speak for themselves' (A Rest., p. xvi). What they 'speak', I would contend, depends on who is listening and when, how and why they are read.

As a counter to these arguments against interpretation, I propose a plea for interpretation. The Cambridge Companion to Sylvia Plath seeks to stimulate a plethora of ongoing readings – of primary and secondary sources alike (for biographies and critical studies, like poetry, reward careful and critical reading). Rather than positing a definitive truth about Plath's work, the essays collected below introduce relevant contexts and issues and offer diverse reading practices – all in the service of a multiplicity of interpretations. For it is only by interpretation, by reading, thinking, writing about and discussing these poems, that their richness, complexity and resonance will adequately be recognized.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Thanks, first, to Ray Ryan of Cambridge University Press who commissioned this Companion, to the anonymous reviewers who approved the idea and to the School of Humanities at Kingston University, London whose generous and timely offer of a Research Fellowship ensured that it could be completed. At Kingston I owe particular gratitude to Avril Horner, David Rogers, Sarah Sceats and Meg Jensen. Thanks, too, to friends and colleagues at the Universities of Gloucestershire and Exeter – in particular to Peter Widdowson, Shelley Saguario and Mark Whalan. Others who have offered their interest and support include Stan Smith, Stacy Gillis, Alice Entwistle, Frances Hollingdale, Jeannette Gill and Sheena and Ray Hennessy. It has been a pleasure to work with all the contributors to this companion and I hope that the finished item does their scholarship justice. Final thanks, as always, to Neil Stevens and to Jacob, Freya and Keziah.
