Postal Systems in the Pre-Modern Islamic World

Adam Silverstein's book offers a fascinating account of the official methods of communication employed in the Near East from pre-Islamic times through to the Mamluk period. Postal systems were set up by rulers in order to maintain control over vast tracts of land. These systems, invented centuries before steam-engines or cars, enabled the swift and efficient circulation of different commodities – from people and horses to exotic fruits and ice – and, of course, news and letters. As the correspondence transported often included confidential reports from a ruler's provinces, such postal systems doubled as espionage networks through which news reached the central authorities quickly enough to allow a timely reaction to events. The book sheds light not only on the role of communications technology in Islamic history, but also on how nomadic culture contributed to empire-building in the Near East, and the ways in which the nascent Islamic state distinguished itself from the Byzantine and Sasanid empires that preceded it. This is a long-awaited contribution to the history of pre-modern communications systems in the Near Eastern world.

ADAM SILVERSTEIN is Lecturer in Islamic History at the Oriental Institute, University of Oxford.

Acknowledgements

This book could easily have been written without the help of the following people, but it would have been awful. It is a pleasure to thank Tarif Khalidi, who expertly supervised the doctoral thesis on which chapter 2 is based, and who instilled in me a deep appreciation of Islamic civilisation. Charles Melville and C. Edmund Bosworth examined the thesis and made several comments that improved it. I would not have found my way onto a doctoral programme of any sort, let alone one concerned with Islamic History, had it not been for the inspiring guidance of Patricia Crone, who introduced me to the subject when I was an undergraduate in Cambridge. Ever since then, she has selflessly offered me her time, help, advice, and support at numerous junctures, for which I shall always be grateful. Geoffrey Khan and Petra Sijpesteijn have generously shared their expertise in Arabic papyrology with me on a number of occasions, and both have showed me that ‘humanity’ and the Humanities are indeed compatible – just when I was beginning to doubt it.

A number of scholars have been kind enough to read and comment on individual chapters of this book: Patricia Crone read chapters 3 and 4; Charles Melville read chapter 4; and Robert Irwin read chapter 5. Their advice has always seemed entirely sensible even if, in my stubbornness, I have not always taken it. Chase Robinson, an ideal colleague in every way, read a draft of the entire book and improved it considerably.

I would like to thank Marigold Acland and the editors of Cambridge Studies in Islamic Civilisation for encouraging me to write this book, Isabelle Dambricourt and Jodie Barnes for seeing it through the process of publication. I also wish to acknowledge the generous support of the British Academy, who awarded me a three-year post-doctoral fellowship, during which period much of the research for this book was carried out.

To the extent that taking up Islamic Studies (instead of Law) was meant to be an act of teenage rebellion, my parents took it disarmingly well and have lovingly encouraged me in every way from day one. And if there is even an ounce of scholar in me, it can easily be traced to their genes. To my wife Sophie, a true woman of valour, I owe my happiness. ‘Many women have excelled, but you surpass them all’ (Proverbs 31: 29).
