INTRODUCTION

1 COMEDY AT ROME

In 240 BCE, following their victory over Carthage in the First Punic War, the Romans expanded a traditional fall celebration honoring Jupiter, the ludi Romani, into an international festival in the Greek style. Since that meant, among other things, adding formal dramatic productions to the scheduled entertainments, the Senate commissioned a Greek from Tarentum named Andronicus to produce a tragedy and a comedy in Latin for the occasion. The experiment proved so successful that by the early second century plays of various kinds had become regular features at three additional festivals, the ludi plebeii (November), Apollinares (July), and Megalenses (April), and also began appearing on the bill at votive games, triumphs, and the more elaborate aristocratic funerals. Plays were created on Greek topics and Roman ones, ranging from the serious to the comic, from myth to history to the foibles of daily life, and whether by accident or design, their growing popularity made them a significant medium for popularizing Roman traditions and fostering Roman civic identity.

Yet of the many different types of play performed on these occasions, only Latin comedies performed in Greek dress, the so-called comedia palliata, survive in more than fragments, and of the two hundred or so plays written for the palliata stage in the third and second centuries by a dozen or more different playwrights, only the six of Terence and twenty by Plautus survive intact. The history of this palliata comedy is well treated...
INTRODUCTION

elsewhere and requires no repetition here, but three overarching factors in our understanding of the genre are particularly important to acknowledge when assessing the construction of any individual play and the way a Roman audience would have responded to it.

1.1 Conditions of Performance

Large-scale formal support for drama, the kind of institutional support found in the Greek world, was alien to the Roman experience. There was no equivalent in Republican Rome to the Athenians’ heavy public investment in theatrical entertainment, which included a formal civic mechanism for selecting plays and funding productions, and an increasingly elaborate permanent home for them in the precinct of Dionysus. Occasions like the Greater Dionysia soon became highpoints of the liturgical and civic calendar: immense prestige attached to the dramatic competitions at Athens, which even in the fifth century could turn producers, playwrights, and actors into celebrities. In later times, itinerant professional companies performed their own versions of Athenian plays throughout the Hellenistic world. These companies also enjoyed considerable, though less political prestige and enjoyed the use of elaborate public facilities in the cities they visited. That renown makes the comparative informality of the corresponding Roman arrangements especially striking.

Though the Senate authorized the staging of plays and made a financial contribution to their production, it persistently refused to sanction construction of a permanent theater in the city. Arrangements were left largely to the discretion and personal resources of the magistrates responsible for fragmentary Vidularia) are probably the ones that survive. Much less is known of the plays on Roman themes in Roman dress, the so-called praetextae and togatae. See Wiseman 2008, and for full discussion of the Republican genres, Manuwald 2011: 129–86.

1 Gratwick 1982 provides an excellent, brief introduction; a full account is provided by Manuwald 2011: 144–56. Duckworth 1952 and Hunter 1985 remain valuable. Manuwald 2010 offers a rich assortment of ancient testimonia.

the games, who would contract for a temporary stage to be built on each occasion before the temple of the god being honored. That structure included a backdrop (scaenae frons) usually presenting two or three house doors and an acting platform before it representing the street (platea, 796n.). A small altar was also visible (726n.). Thus in An., one door represented the house of Simo and a second that of Chrysis and Glycerium. (Whether a third door was used for Charinus’ house is unclear.) In addition to these functional doors, entrances and exits could be made from the two sides of the stage. At Athens, where New Comedy’s conventions were developed, the orientation of the Theater of Dionysus suggests that the wing to the spectators’ right would appear to lead to the agora and harbor and that to their left toward the country, but this convention may not have been consistently employed. At Rome, dramatists continued to represent forum and country (or harbor) in opposite directions, but since the orientation of Roman stages is unknown (and was probably variable), no consistent representation of left and right can be established.

Limited seating may have been provided immediately before this stage structure in the area Greek theaters reserved for choral performances, but most spectators would have had to find their own places on or around the temple or in the adjacent area. Roman actors, instead of performing in an enclosed building that by its very nature committed actors and spectators to the shared endeavor of creating a play, therefore had to work much harder to attract and hold the attention of their audiences, who were subject to distraction by rival entertainments in the vicinity or by the discomforts of whatever vantage points they had secured. A kernel of

For the festivals at which T. offered plays, these magistrates were the aediles. Their precise role in the production process and the value of these shows for furthering their careers is obscure. See Gruen 1992: 188–95.

Thus Vitr. 5.6.8 notes una a foro altera a peregre aditus in scaenam. See Beare 1964: 248–55, and for Athenian practice, Taplin 1977: 449–51. The porters’ entrance at An. 28 would have established one direction as to the forum, with the opposite then leading abroad, as for Crito’s arrival from Andros at 796. Access to the stage through the orchestra, as shown on so many phlyax vases (n. 18), is not indicated one way or the other in the extant texts.

This is most clearly the arrangement at the Megalensia, where the space on the Palatine hill before the temple of the Magna Mater was especially restricted (Goldberg 1998). Conditions in the forum, where funeral games were celebrated, would have been somewhat different (Goldberg 2018, Hanses 2020a). See more generally Marshall 2006: 31–56, Sear 2006: 54–7, Manuwald 2011: 55–68, and for the temporary stages themselves, Beacham 2007. The first set of plays performed at Augustus’ Ludi Saeculares in 17 BCE deliberately recalled the archaic style by being offered in scaena quo theatrum adiectum non fuit nullis positis sedilibus (CIL VI.32323 = ILS 5050, lines 100–101). Cf. the tradition dimly recalled by Tac. Ann. 14.20 si uetustiora repetas, stantem populum spectauisse.

7 For the festivals at which T. offered plays, these magistrates were the aediles. Their precise role in the production process and the value of these shows for furthering their careers is obscure. See Gruen 1992: 188–95.
8 Thus Vitr. 5.6.8 notes una a foro altera a peregre aditus in scaenam. See Beare 1964: 248–55, and for Athenian practice, Taplin 1977: 449–51. The porters’ entrance at An. 28 would have established one direction as to the forum, with the opposite then leading abroad, as for Crito’s arrival from Andros at 796. Access to the stage through the orchestra, as shown on so many phlyax vases (n. 18), is not indicated one way or the other in the extant texts.
9 This is most clearly the arrangement at the Megalensia, where the space on the Palatine hill before the temple of the Magna Mater was especially restricted (Goldberg 1998). Conditions in the forum, where funeral games were celebrated, would have been somewhat different (Goldberg 2018, Hanses 2020a). See more generally Marshall 2006: 31–56, Sear 2006: 54–7, Manuwald 2011: 55–68, and for the temporary stages themselves, Beacham 2007. The first set of plays performed at Augustus’ Ludi Saeculares in 17 BCE deliberately recalled the archaic style by being offered in scaena quo theatrum adiectum non fuit nullis positis sedilibus (CIL VI.32323 = ILS 5050, lines 100–101). Cf. the tradition dimly recalled by Tac. Ann. 14.20 si uetustiora repetas, stantem populum spectauisse.
INTRODUCTION

truth may thus underlie T.’s complaint in the Hec. prologues of performances disrupted by the prospect of acrobats (4–5), boxers (33–6), and gladiators (39–42).

The improvisational quality of the Roman venues had further consequences. A purpose-built stage necessarily limited rehearsal time on site, with an especially narrow window in the case of the Megalensia, since the aediles responsible did not assume office until mid-March and the festival was held at the beginning of April. The resulting time constraints may have encouraged what became some of Roman comedy’s most striking features, e.g. its passion for stock scenes and routines, its opportunities for improvisation, and the occasional traces in our texts of places to expand or shorten, elaborate or simplify performances as time and circumstances required. Such flexibility was facilitated by the high degree of professionalism that characterized Roman drama from the time the Senate first charged Andronicus with the task of producing plays. How he created those first scripts in Latin and recruited actors capable of performing them are among the many mysteries of early Roman theatrical history, but it is clear that by the end of the third century, a community of actors and writers was officially established at Rome as a professional guild under the patronage of Minerva. Contracts for producing plays were awarded to these companies of professional actors, not to individual playwrights, and the heads of the companies assumed responsibility for the success of the shows.

This at least is the role that T.’s impresario, Ambivius Turpio, claims for himself in the prologues to Hau. and Hec. Turpio was a senex by the 160s and speaks to T.’s audiences with the authority of age: he identifies himself as the young playwright’s patron (Hec. 52 in tutelam meam), as he had been a generation earlier for the great Caecilius (Hec. 14–15). A curious anecdote about Turpio in rehearsal tells us a little more about their partnership. Turpio, says Don., played the parasite Phormio while yawning, tipsy, and scratching his ear, and T., though initially annoyed by the actor’s apparent inebriation, eventually had to admit that this insouciance was exactly what he had imagined for the character. The playwright’s active engagement in the rehearsal is as striking as the actor’s condition. Turpio’s company produced all six of T.’s plays, and the scripts may well have been tailored to the capabilities of the troupe. That kind of customization has long been suspected for Plautus: among the more obvious signs of a similar process in the Terentian corpus is the variety of musical effects in the recitatives, which may reflect the special talents of Turpio’s resident musician, Flaccus. The contributions of people like Turpio and Flaccus remind us that success on the Roman stage required considerably more than just a good script.

10 Thus Ritschl 1845a: 348 took Pl.’s joke at Trin. 900 sapulabias meo arbitratu et novorum aedilium (“You’ll be beaten on my order and that of the new aediles”) to indicate performance at the Megalensia. Contracts might possibly have been negotiated in the interval between the aediles’ election and installation – the story at Eun. 19–24 assumes sufficient time for the aediles to award a contract and Luscius to challenge it – but physical preparation on site could only have come later.

11 Plautine texts sometimes contain “doublets” that likely represent alternative ways to play a scene, e.g. with more or less elaborate music (Goldberg 2004), or preserve the remains of successive variations (Jocelyn 1995). For the role of stock scenes and improvisations, see the essays in Benz et al. 1995 and Marshall 2006: 260–79.

12 Festus 333M, though the details of this so-called Collegium poetarum are debated. See Jory 1970, Horsfall 1976, Gruen 1990: 87–90. The theatrical community at Rome consisted largely of freedmen and slaves.

1.2 The Audience

The improvisational quality of Roman venues also facilitated contact, or at least the illusion of contact, between actors and audience. The inevitable commotion as a play gets under way is evoked in various Plautine prologues, such as this moment in Poenulus. What few details of original performance survived the six centuries between T. and Don. probably entered the scholarly tradition through Varro. The comment on Ambivius’ acting style at Cic. Sen. 48 may simply be Cicero’s own experience of Roscius projected back on an earlier generation.

14 Don. ad Ph. 315 quibus auditis exclamavit poeta se tam eum scriberet cognisse parasitum. What few details of original performance survived the six centuries between T. and Don. probably entered the scholarly tradition through Varro. The comment on Ambivius’ acting style at Cic. Sen. 48 may simply be Cicero’s own experience of Roscius projected back on an earlier generation.

15 For the importance of the company (grex) in the collaborative effort of play-production, see Marshall 2006: 83–94. Kruschwitz 2016. Flaccus is credited in the didascaliae with the music for each of the six plays, a striking distinction. Cf. Fraenkel 2007 (1960): 416, “In general one must never forget that a writer like Plautus who wrote all his comedies for performance by a particular company on a particular occasion, had to take account of the aptitudes of the actors who composed the troupe.” Gilula 1989: 104–105 makes a similar point about T. Similarly, the Shakespearean corpus reflects the changing strengths over time of the Chamberlains’ and King’s Men and the different requirements of the (outdoor) Globe and (indoor) Blackfriars. See Shapiro 2010: 228–31, 245–51.

16 Pl. Poen. 17–20, though all of 1–45 contributes to the picture. Additional vignettes of the Roman audience appear at Amph. 64–95 and As. 4–5.
INTRODUCTION

Let’s have no worn-out tart sitting on the stage or lictor bandying words or rods waving or an usher getting in someone’s face or seating anyone while an actor is on the stage. (17–20)

At Captivi 10–14, the prologue-speaker interrupts his own exposition to single out an individual in the crowd for abuse, confirming in the process how indistinct the boundaries of improvised theatrical space can be.

iam hoc tenetis? optumest.

negat hercle illic ultumus. accedito.
si non ubi sedes locus est, est ubi ambules, quando histrionem cogis mendicarier.
ego me tua caussa, ne erres, non rupturus sum.

Have you got this then? Great.

That man far in the back says no. Come forward.

If there’s no place to sit, take a hike, since you’re forcing an actor into beggary.

I won’t rupture myself for your sake, so you don’t miss anything.

Still more striking is a similar interaction during the performance, as Euclio in Aulularia desperately seeks to recover his stolen treasure.17 obsecro uos ego, mi auxilio, oro, obtestor, sitis et hominem demonstretis, quis eam abstulerit.

quid est? quid ridetis? noui omnes, scio fures esse hic complures, qui uestitu et creta occultant sese atque sedent quasi sint frugi.

quid ais tu? tibi credere certum est, nam esse bonum ex uoltu cognosco.

hem, nemo habet horum? occidisti. dic igitur, quis habet?

necis?

Please help me, all of you!

I beg, I implore you to point out the man who took it.

What’s that? You laugh? I know you all. I know there are plenty of thieves here, who disguise themselves in fancy clothes and sit about like honest men.

17 Pl. Aul. 715–20. Direct address to the audience in Greek comedy tends to be more generic. See the examples in Bain 1977: 190–4. Dionysus’ appeal to his priest at Aristoph. Ra. 297 is a closer, though more fleeting, parallel.
What do you say? I’ll surely believe you, since I see from your face you’re upright.

What? None of these has it? You’ve done me in. Say then, who has it? You don’t know?

His first, sweeping appeal seems generic, but the switch to the singular at 719 (quid ais tu?) means that Euclio has singled out an individual, and the follow-up (hem . . . ?) means he waits for a response and does not immediately let go of his victim. Seating that brought spectators close to the stage platform would have facilitated such immediacy, allowing actors to acknowledge and perhaps even to mingle with them in the course of the performance, especially if the action spilled beyond the confines of the scaena.18

Euclio’s address is also striking because those men in their fancy clothes may have included members of the senatorial elite: after 194 BCE, senators in attendance at the shows could claim special places for themselves that later practice suggests were immediately before the stage.19 If Euclio’s jibe reflects the widespread resentment this new privilege generated, it may also suggest greater license for social comment than is often envisioned in Roman contexts. The fact that senators could claim this right does not necessarily mean, of course, that they ever attended in large numbers or that the shows were staged primarily for their benefit: other sources allude to women, children, slaves and the urban poor among the crowd.20 What united them all was their passion for pallaia comedy. The very strength of the tradition and the enthusiasm with which dramatists embraced and exploited its conventions suggest an audience well versed in its devices and deeply appreciative of its effects. Thus John Wright, after documenting the enduring appeal of its traditionality, concludes: “Widely 18 The so-called phlyax vases of southern Italy, e.g. the Cheiron vase and New York Goose Play (figs. 12.6 and 10.2 in Taplin 1993), often show action in what would notionally be the audience’s space, and while this material predates the pallaia by as much as two centuries, it is hard to imagine Roman producers ignoring such easy opportunities to enrich their action.

19 So Cic. Har. resp. 24 ante populi consessum senatus locum. Liv. 34.44 and 54, Val. Max. 2.4.3, Ascon. 70C are less specific. The motives and effects of this development remain unclear, though the resentment it aroused is well attested. See Gruen 1992: 202–205, Gibula 1996. The joke at Capt. 15–16 expands to acknowledge wealthier spectators, though not necessarily senators, in their seats. On the whole vexed question of seating by class, see Rawson 1987, and for Roman seating more generally, Moore 1995, Beare 1964: 241–7. The practice is easier to envision – and enforce – in the formal theaters of later times than at the temporary venues of the second century.

INTRODUCTION

travelled (many would have seen some of the best Greek theater of the day during military service in Sicily and South Italy), self-confident, sophisticated, thoroughly accustomed, thanks to their experiences in forum, court, and comitium, to every facet of artistic verbal ritual, the Romans clearly made up one of the great theatrical audiences of all time.” The details are probably exaggerated: not all were widely travelled or could claim active experience of forum, court, and comitium, but a significant majority surely knew what they wanted and insisted upon getting it. And they were almost certainly demonstrative in making known their pleasure or disappointment. Notoriously animated in Cicero’s day, there is no reason to think Roman audiences were any more restrained a century and more earlier.

1.3 Greek Models

In saying that his Andria re-works two plays by Menander (9–14), T. alludes to a basic fact of contemporary practice: Roman dramatists did not create palliata scripts out of nothing. Their characters, plots, and settings all originated in the New Comedy of fourth- and third-century Athens. Pl., too, may freely and even proudly admit as much.

Clerumenoe uocatur haec comedia graece, latine Sortientes. Diphilus hanc graece scripsit, postid rursum denuo latine Plautus cum latranti nomine.

This comedy is called Clerumenoi in Greek, in Latin The Lottery. Diphilus wrote it in Greek; the eventual Latin remake was done by Plautus, of the barking name. (Pl. Cas. 31–4) graece haec uocatur Emporos Philemonis, eadem latine Mercator Macci Titii.

In Greek this play of Philemon is called Emporos, the Latin version is The Merchant of Titus Maccius. (Pl. Merc. 9–10)

21 Wright 1974: 191. The old stereotype of the obtuse Roman audience, e.g. Norwood 1923: 2 "the immense majority of Romans did not appreciate good art," has largely vanished from scholarship.

22 Cic. often notes the animation of audiences for both tragedies and comedies, e.g. Amic. 40, Parad. 5.26, Q. Rosc. 30, and with a specifically political turn, Att. 2.19.3, Sest. 118–23. Greek audiences were famously demonstrative in all periods: Csapo and Slater 1995: 301–305.
Fidelity to these models was not a priority. Simply preserving the original Greek dress and settings for characters who then proceeded to speak and act like Romans inevitably turned Athenian comedies of daily life into Roman domestic fantasies. Plautus went even further. His musical extravaganzas may owe nearly as much to native Italian traditions of stage entertainment as to what he found in Diphilus or Menander, and he sometimes stretched his models well beyond the point of recognition. T.’s more restrained style of adaptation created plays that are easier to reconcile with scholarly preconceptions about Greek comic art, but the difference between the two dramatists does not obviate a central issue common to all discussions of Roman comedy: What counts as “original” or “creative” in a tradition so shamelessly derived from another?

That question has a long, problematic history in the study of Roman comedy. By the late nineteenth century, scholars anxious to see through the Latin plays to the lost Greek ones behind them were not always kind to the Roman authors whose techniques of adaptation often obscured their view. Even the great Friedrich Leo, a particularly astute and appreciative reader of Plautus, treated him as a stepping-stone to something else.

The subsequent rediscovery of much original New Comedy, which began in earnest with publication of the Cairo codex of Menander in 1907 and continues to the present day, has gradually relieved this pressure on the Latin texts. Hellenists with genuine New Comedy to read increasingly leave the Latin “copies” to Latinists and allow the Roman plays to stand on their own merits. Pl.’s reputation has risen accordingly. His passion for the stock characters and situations of the palliata, his mastery of lyric rhythms (rivaled only by Horace nearly two centuries later), and the easy rapport he established with his audience evoke widespread admiration: we have learned to judge his achievement not by how well he escapes, but by how brilliantly he exploits his traditional material.

At Cas. 60–6, 1012–14, Pl. proudly claims responsibility for what must have been a significant change in the action and emphasis of the original, and Epd. has been so radically reworked that the contours of its putative model have long defied recognition (Fantham 1981). On the general problem of “models,” see Manuwald 2011: 282–92. Fraenkel 2007 (1922): 275–86 on how Pl. “dismembered” Greek drama remains basic.

So in the words of his student Fraenkel 2007 (1922): 2, “Leo loved Plautus, but he loved Greek comedy even more, and if he could gain access to the Greek forms through the Roman plays, this gave him complete satisfaction, and sometimes he did not go any further.” See Goldberg 1986: 61–6, Halporn 1993: 191–6, and Goldberg 2011: 206–10.

This is the great lesson of Wright 1974: 195–6. Few today would agree with Norwood 1923: 1 that Pl. “wrote like a blacksmith mending a watch.”
that so preoccupied Fraenkel’s generation, “How did Plautus translate?”, no longer seems pressing. As Erich Segal noted at the very start of this shift in the scholarly paradigm, “once the play begins, everything becomes ‘Plautus’.”

T. nevertheless speaks of rendering a scene from Diphilus “word for word” (Ad. 11 urbiun de verbo expressum extulit), a suggestion of fidelity only strengthened by the ancient exegetical tradition, which occasionally encourages comparison with his Greek models. Don. sometimes quotes phrases that suggest direct translation, as at An. 204, where T.’s nil me fallis clearly renders Men.’s νῦν δ’ οὐ λεληθάς με, while Men.’s version of the midwife’s instruction at An. 484 preserved in the Byzantine anthology of Photius, καὶ τεττάρων | ὁμών μετὰ τοῦτο, φιλτάτε, τὸ νεόττιον (“and afterwards, dear, the yolk of four eggs”) has prompted considerable discussion of T.’s departure from its greater specificity. Fidelity on this verbal level, however, is regularly eclipsed by more radical changes. Eliminating an expository prologue, interpolating scenes or characters from a second play, turning dialogue to monologue (or monologue to dialogue), and eliminating act divisions inevitably produce significant alterations in the way a play works on its audience. The one case where an extant Roman play can now be set against a continuous fragment of its original, Pl.’s Bacchides and Men.’s Dis Exapaton, clearly shows the Roman dramatist altering not only the sequence of his action, but the psychology of his actors. Equally significant changes in T. can be harder to evaluate since our knowledge of them comes largely through the filter of Don.’s commentary (Introduction 6); a comparative approach working from that sort of evidence may in the end leave us suspecting rather more than we can know about what was a complex creative process. If what we really Segal 1987: 6. On the earlier question, cf. Fraenkel 2007 (1922): 3-4 and the new Preface to the English edition, xi-xxii. By 1960, Fraenkel had acknowledged the futility of reconstructing lost originals: “Perhaps it will be necessary to make do, more often than Leo, Jachmann, and I did, with the finding that the course of the action which we find in Plautus could not have been the same in a Greek comedy, and it will be necessary to give up the attempt to reconstruct the action or essential elements of the action of lost Greek plays” (416).

See commentary ad loc. and Appendix II for a full list of Greek quotations. Close translation is not unique to T. The correspondence of what is now Men. fr. 111 K–T ὃν οἱ θεοὶ φιλοῦσιν ἀποθνήσκει νέος to Pl. Bacch. 816–17 quem di diligunt/adolescens moritur helped Ritschl 1845b: 406 identify Dis Exapaton as Pl.’s model.

The papyrus, officially published in 1997 as P. Oxy. 4407, has been known and discussed since 1968. See Handley 2001, and for analysis from a Roman perspective, Damen 1992, Batstone 2005. The structural comparison is unique in the record, though an extended stylistic comparison is also provided by Gell. 2.23, setting excerpts from Caecilius’ Plocium against its Menandrean model. See Wright 1974: 120–6.