The Sex of Men in Premodern Europe

How were male bodies viewed before the Enlightenment? And what does this reveal about attitudes towards sex and gender in premodern Europe? This richly textured cultural history investigates the characterization of the sex of adult male bodies from ancient Greece to the seventeenth century. Before the modern focus on the phallic, penetrative qualities of male anatomy, Patricia Simons finds that men's bodies were considered in terms of their active physiological characteristics, in relation to semen, testicles and what was considered innately masculine heat. Reorienting attention from an anatomical to a physiological focus, and from fertility to pleasure, Simons argues that women's sexual agency was perceived in terms of active reception of the valuable male seed. This provocative, compelling study draws on visual, material and textual evidence to elucidate a broad range of material, from medical learning, high art and literary metaphors to obscene badges, codpieces and pictorial or oral jokes.

Patricia Simons is Professor, History of Art, at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. She has curated several exhibitions including Seeing is Healing? The visual arts of medicine (2000), and her previous publications include Patronage, art and society in Renaissance Italy (co-editor, 1987).
Cambridge Social and Cultural Histories

Series editors:

Colin Jones, University of Warwick

New cultural histories have recently expanded the parameters (and enriched the methodologies) of social history. Cambridge Social and Cultural Histories recognises the plurality of current approaches to social and cultural history as distinctive points of entry into a common explanatory project. Open to innovative and interdisciplinary work, regardless of its chronological or geographical location, the series encompasses a broad range of histories of social relationships and of the cultures that inform them and lend them meaning. Historical anthropology, historical sociology, comparative history, gender history and historicist literary studies – among other subjects – all fall within the remit of Cambridge Social and Cultural Histories.

It is a special pleasure to thank a cadre of stalwart friends who read the first, unwieldy draft of this book in its entirety. Without the astute comments and constant support over the years from the Gang of Four, Louise Marshall, Timothy McCall, Sean Roberts and Monika Schmitter, the project would not have come to fruition. This book is dedicated to them with heartfelt gratitude.

Struggling to balance succinctness against yet more information and ideas, I have tried to take into sufficient account the valuable thoughts of everyone, including Colin Jones and Lyndal Roper. Katharine Park very generously offered useful reflections on an early version of Chapter 4. Margaret Lourie provided valuable editorial guidance, and I also appreciate the work of all the staff at Cambridge University Press.

An incalculable debt is owed to the librarians and institutions that continue to support historical research at a time of funding constraints and short-sighted presentism. In particular, I have benefited from the always awe inspiring collections at the British Library, and the holdings at the University of Michigan Library, including the Taubman Health Sciences Library, as well as interlibrary loans.

Funding to support the publication of the number of photographs necessary in an interdisciplinary, wide-ranging study was gratefully received from the Office of the Vice President of Research, and the Department of History of Art, at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. For all the research advantages of the digital age, certain suppliers of images are obstructing the affordable, long-term publication of images in digital form. At the opposite extreme, the semi-automated, free service of the British Museum is a model for all collections wishing to encourage research on their objects.

Kelly has been a constant and beloved companion during the writing of this book, most recently in her makeshift feline hospice on my desk. I provide the room service, she walks over the keyboard on occasion to leave her mark. If any typos remain in this book, say hello to Kelly.
