

Introduction: Stoppardianism

I admit it looks odd. The question is does it look odd enough?

The Dog It Was That Died (18)

Mix vaudevillian slapstick with crisp, witty banter. Add a song or two in the style of Gilbert and Sullivan. Try doing a whole scene in limericks. How about a shell game using humans popping in and out of shower stalls? Maybe add some really funny Communist Bloc shenanigans. Set it on a verandah in India, or on a transatlantic passenger liner, or in nineteenth-century Vienna, or in the secret byways of Elsinore Castle. Why not open eyes with a striptease act on a flying trapeze? Maybe parody the work of Agatha Christie. Or play fast and loose with Oscar Wilde. How about tapping into chaos theory or quantum mechanics? How about trying three full-length plays dedicated to the nineteenth-century Russian intelligentsia? Or how about taking on Shakespeare himself? And always leave your audiences wondering whether they have just been educated or entertained, in the end allowing for the likelihood of both.

In a nutshell, that is the theatre of Tom Stoppard.¹

Stoppard has been going strong since the 1960s, generating five decades of consistently good theatre throughout. Consider his breakthrough Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead (1966), an award-winning “first” play that has hardly seen a day since its premiere when it was not being performed somewhere in the world. It was followed by the 1970s masterpieces Jumpers (1972) and Travesties (1974), which, combined with Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead, would by themselves have been sufficient to rate Stoppard a major playwright. But Stoppard continued, generating two successful West End plays in Night and Day (1978) and The Real Thing (1982). Hapgood (1988) followed, a robust and intellectually challenging “science play,” which preceded what many think may be Stoppard’s masterpiece, the science-informed, time-warping love story with a twist, Arcadia (1995). Stoppard followed that success with Indian Ink (1995) and The Invention of Love (1997), two more award-winning stage triumphs. This was followed up with yet another wonder of the theatre, his epic trilogy The Coast of Utopia (2002), which was in turn followed up with Rock'n'Roll (2006).

2 The Cambridge Introduction to Tom Stoppard

This extensive list, impressive by itself, fails to include Stoppard's numerous radio plays (like Albert's Bridge, 1967), shorter works (like The Real Inspector Hound, 1968), television plays (like Squaring the Circle, 1984), adaptations (like On the Razzle, 1981), and collaborations (like Every Good Boy Deserves Favor, 1977). And it overlooks Stoppard's notable dalliance with cinema, writing or co-writing the Oscar-nominated Brazil (1985), Oscar-winning Shakespeare in Love (1997), and numerous other works, including The Romantic Englishwoman (1975), Despair (1979), Empire of the Sun (1987), Billy Bathgate (1991), and The Russia House (1991). And then there is his much underappreciated novel, Lord Malquist and Mr. Moon (1966).

Anyone who has come in contact with any of the above works will surely agree that Stoppard is a consummate entertainer. But the entertainment is always enriched with an element of intellectual probing that challenges audiences in ways unique to his theatre. When at his best, Stoppard manages to draw from the minimalist likes of Samuel Beckett while making sure our eyes and ears are treated to sights and sounds that at times rival even Disney Productions, Inc. In a 1977 interview, Stoppard laid out his goals: "I want to demonstrate that I can make serious points by flinging a custard pie around the stage for a couple of hours."² Though he has yet to work with custard pies, he has tried just about everything else. If the audience is bored, Stoppard has failed. If the audience is not thinking, Stoppard has failed. Stoppard persistently repeats the point whenever interviewed: "Theatre is first and foremost a recreation. But it is not just a children's playground; it can be recreation for people who like to stretch their minds."³

Tom Stoppard likes to tell a story about a neighbor who owned a peacock.⁴ One morning while drinking coffee and getting ready for work, the neighbor notices that the bird has gotten out of his yard. He puts on his slippers, grabs his coffee, and goes after the peacock, tracking it down on the other side of a major highway full of rush-hour traffic. He grabs the peacock, calms his squirming, awkward burden as best he can, and returns to the highway ready to cross when he feels his loose-fitting pajama pants slipping to his knees. Here is a question: what are the motorists thinking as they speed by a man in pajamas holding a coffee mug and a peacock? What would you be thinking?

Glimpses, vignettes, incomplete pictures. Something far less than the whole story. For Stoppard this tale does much to capture the human condition. We all want to know the whole story, to see the big picture, but all we get is a limited view of what is going on. Stoppard's theatre reminds us of the myopia that is so frustratingly central to being human. But his theatre does not sink to pensive self-pity in the standard way that so much modern theatre (and so much art in general) does. Other artists often take this limited drive-by vision and claim that this is all there is to life, concluding that the human condition is basically incomprehensibly absurd. What Stoppard suggests, however, is that our general bewilderment is not the result of a meaningless universe but the result of our current perceptual and intellectual shortcomings as human beings. For Stoppard, it is the great pleasure of life to work at getting a better view and arriving at a better understanding of those great perplexing mysteries of life. C. W. E. Bigsby observes that while the big picture may in fact forever lie just beyond our grasp, maintaining an “irrepressible vitality and eccentric persistence” constitutes “what Stoppard feels to be an authentic response to existence.”⁵

One man’s bag is nearly empty, and another’s is nearly full. They are tossing coins, and for some time now each toss has come up “heads.” It is a highly improbable event, but it is not impossible. This is the subject of the opening scene of Stoppard’s first big success, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead. That scene introduces us to what Stoppard will be doing for the next forty-plus years. He will take cold cool logic and just about every sensible way of looking at the world, and he will turn it all on its head over and over again. But Stoppard does not do this merely to entertain us with eccentric portrayals of comically absurd consequences. He focuses on the extreme horizons of probability in order to reveal to us that the world is far stranger and far more interesting than many of us ever imagined.

Stoppard’s unique brand of theatre has led to the coining of the word “Stoppardian,” putting him among the ranks of modernist and contemporary theatre innovators like Shaw (Shavian), Beckett (Beckettian), and Pinter (Pinteresque). Stoppardianism combines perplexing but undoubted rationalism with baroque linguistic precision to create comic plots filled with paradoxical uncertainties that somehow generate complex but logically satisfying results. Furthermore Stoppard’s theatre integrates challenging intellectual concepts with high theatricality, so that, for example, an acrobatics routine becomes an illustration of agile minds at work; creating a deceptively realistic play-within-a-play rocks our notion of what is “the real thing” in theatre or anywhere else; and having one character morph into two characters gives us the chance to think about the multiple roles we all play in real life. Using the entertaining illusion of theatre to reflect upon the serious matters of life – that is Stoppardianism.

Not surprisingly, then, Stoppard takes a stand curiously atypical of many word-bound playwrights. Stoppard, a man who creates playscripts, insists that dramatic works are poor shadows of themselves when viewed as stand-alone

4 The Cambridge Introduction to Tom Stoppard

art. They are best experienced when they take to the stage. Using a production of Hapgood as his example, Stoppard observes: “On to a shadowy empty stage, while short-wave radio voices are occupied in keeping tabs on a car somewhere in the streets of London, a swimming-pool’s diving tower descends soundlessly from the flies . . . the tower comes to earth as lightly as a leaf, and thus with perfect elegance and economy makes the first clear statement of the evening: ‘We are at the pool, and now we begin.’” He concludes: “you can’t write anything that good; and when you think about it, some, perhaps, most, of the best moments you can remember from plays are moments which nobody wrote.”⁶

Tom Stoppard energetically recognizes the collaborative nature of the theatre and gives credit where it is due. While his plays are very good reads, they make for even better theatre when placed in the hands of talented theatre practitioners.

The Cambridge Introduction to Tom Stoppard is designed to help the theatregoer, reader, and student to better appreciate the world of Tom Stoppard on the page as well as stage. What immediately follows are a professional chronology, biographical sketch, and chapter on the keys to Stoppard’s theatre in general. The subsequent chapters touch upon notable minor works while concentrating on Stoppard’s major accomplishments. Interconnections among his works abound, and so it is unfortunate that space limitations prevent discussions of most of Stoppard’s cinematic accomplishments (Shakespeare in Love is one exception).⁷ Generally speaking, though, this book’s ultimate goal is to encourage you to see, read, and listen to all of Stoppard’s works, even those not covered in these pages.

Professional chronology

A scrap of knowledge to add to our stock.

The Invention of Love (38)

1960

- The Gamblers and A Walk on the Water are written.

1963

- A Walk on the Water is rewritten as a 90-minute television play and broadcast by Rediffusion, November.

1964

- The Dissolution of Dominic Boot, a 15-minute radio play, airs in the BBC series Just Before Midnight, February.
- “M” is for Moon among Other Things, a 15-minute radio play, airs in the BBC series Just Before Midnight, April.
- A Walk on the Water is Stoppard’s first fully staged play, June 30, in Hamburg, Germany, as a translated work entitled Der Spleen des George Riley.

1965

- The Gamblers is produced at the Bristol Old Vic Theatre School by a Bristol University student group.

6 The Cambridge Introduction to Tom Stoppard

1966

- If You're Glad I'll be Frank, a radio play, is broadcast by BBC's Third Programme, February 8, on the program Strange Occupations.
- A Separate Peace, a 30-minute television play, airs on BBC 2, August.
- Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead premieres in Cranston Street Hall at the Edinburgh Festival Fringe, August 24, by the Oxford Theatre Group.
- Lord Malquist and Mr. Moon (novel) is published by Faber & Faber.

1967

- Teeth, a 30-minute television play, airs February 7.
- Another Moon Called Earth, a 30-minute television play, airs in June.
- Albert's Bridge, a radio play, airs on BBC's Third Programme, July 13, winning the Prix Italia Award.
- Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead professionally premieres at the Old Vic Theatre, London, April 11, by the National Theatre, directed by Derek Goldby. Stoppard wins the John Whiting Award (with Wole Soyinka), Plays and Players Best Play Award, and Evening Standard Award for Most Promising Playwright (with David Storey). New York premiere is at the Alvin Theatre, October 16, winning the Tony Award and Drama Critics' Circle Award for Best Play.

1968

- Enter a Free Man, originally A Walk on the Water, opens at St Martin's Theatre, London, on March 28.
- The Real Inspector Hound, a one-act play, opens at the Criterion Theatre, London, on June 17.
- Neutral Ground, a television play written in 1965, airs on Thames Television in December.

1969

- Albert's Bridge is converted to a stage production and performed by the Oxford Theatre Group in Edinburgh.

1970

- Where Are They Now?, a 35-minute radio play, airs January 28 on BBC's Schools Radio.
- The Dissolution of Dominic Boot, converted to the mini-film The Engagement, airs on American television and in British cinemas.
- After Magritte, a one-act play, premieres April 9.

1972

- Jumpers premieres February 2 at the Old Vic, London, by the National Theatre, directed by Peter Wood, winning the Evening Standard and Plays and Players Best Play awards.
- The Real Inspector Hound opens in New York and London with After Magritte as a curtain-raiser.
- Artist Descending a Staircase, a radio play, airs on BBC 3, November 14.

1974

- Travesties premieres in London at the Aldwych Theatre by the Royal Shakespeare Company on June 10, winning the Evening Standard Award for Best Comedy.
- Jumpers opens in New York.
- Enter a Free Man opens in New York.

1975

- Travesties opens in New York, winning the Tony Award and Drama Critics' Circle Award.
- Three Men in a Boat, an adaptation of a Jerome K. Jerome novel, airs on BBC on December 15.
- The Romantic Englishwoman (film, with Thomas Wiseman) released.

1976

- Jumpers is revived at the Lyttelton Theatre, National Theatre (London).

8 The Cambridge Introduction to Tom Stoppard

- Dirty Linen and New-Found-Land, two one-acts, open as an Ambiance Lunch-Hour Theatre Club Presentation at Inter-Action's Almost Free Theatre, London, April 6. On June 16, the plays transfer to the Arts Theatre, London.

1977

- Every Good Boy Deserves Favor, music by André Previn, is given a single performance as part of the Queen's Silver Jubilee at London's Royal Festival Hall on July 1. It is revived with chamber orchestra in London's West End.
- Professional Foul, a television play, airs on BBC on September 24, winning the British Critics' Award for best television drama.

1978

- Stoppard is appointed CBE (Commander of the British Empire).
- Every Good Boy Deserves Favor opens in Washington, DC.
- Night and Day premieres November 8 at London's Phoenix Theatre, winning the Evening Standard Award for Best Play.
- Despair (film, from a Nabokov novel) released.

1979

- Every Good Boy Deserves Favor opens in New York.
- Undiscovered Country, an adaptation, premieres at the National Theatre, London, June 20, directed by Peter Wood.
- Dogg's Hamlet, Cahoot's Macbeth, two one-act plays, are staged at the Arts Centre of the University of Warwick, Coventry, May 21. On July 30, the plays open at the Collegiate Theatre, London.
- Night and Day opens in New York in November 1979.

1980

- The Human Factor (film, from Graham Greene's novel) released.

1981

- On the Razzle, an adaptation, opens September 1 at the Royal Lyceum Theatre, Edinburgh, as part of the Edinburgh International Festival. It premieres in London at the Lyttelton Theatre, National Theatre, on September 22, directed by Peter Wood.

1982

- The Real Thing opens at London's Strand Theatre in November, winning the Evening Standard Award for Best Play.
- The Dog It Was That Died, a radio play, airs on BBC Radio 4 on December 9.

1984

- The Real Thing premieres in New York January 5, at the Plymouth Theater, winning the Tony Award for Best Play, the New York Critics' Award for Best Foreign Play, and the Drama Desk and Outer Circle awards.
- Squaring the Circle, Poland 1980–81 is televised May on TVS.
- Rough Crossing, an adaptation, premieres at the Lyttelton Theatre, National Theatre, October 30.

1985

- Jumpers is revived at the Aldwych Theatre, London.
- The Real Inspector Hound receives a London revival September 12, at the National Theatre, directed by Tom Stoppard.
- Brazil (film, with Terry Gilliam and Charles Mckewon) released, nominated for Academy Award, Best Original Screenplay.

1986

- Dalliance, an adaptation of a Schnitzler play, opens at the Lyttelton Theatre, National Theatre, May 27, directed by Peter Wood.
- Largo Desolato, an adaptation of a Havel play, opens in Bristol.

10 The Cambridge Introduction to Tom Stoppard

1987

- Empire of the Sun (film, from J. G. Ballard's novel) released.

1988

- Hapgood premieres at the Aldwych Theatre, London, March 8.
- Artist Descending a Staircase is revised and given its first stage production.

1989

- The Dog It Was That Died is adapted for television and airs January.
- Hapgood has US premiere in Los Angeles at the Doolittle Theatre, April 12.

1990

- Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead (film) released.
- The Russia House (film, from John le Carré's novel) released.

1991

- In the Native State, a radio play, airs on BBC Radio 3 on April 21, winning the Giles Cooper Award.
- Billy Bathgate (film, from E. L. Doctorow's novel) released.

1992

- The Real Inspector Hound receives New York revival.
- Shakespeare in Love (film, with Marc Norman from Norman's original screenplay) released, winning Academy Award for Best Original Screenplay.

1993

- Arcadia opens at the Lyttelton Theatre, National Theatre, London, on April 13, directed by Trevor Nunn, winning the Evening Standard Best Play of the Year Award and Lawrence Olivier/BBC Award for Best New Play.
- Travesties receives a London revival.