THE CHIEF PRINCIPLE OF MORALS

- § 1. The principle of human value is the chief principle of morals. I
- § 2. But it can be fully recognized as such only if there exists a widely-inclusive political state; 13
- § 3. where the citizens are well-disposed towards each other, 21
- § 4. wealth is equitably distributed, 22
- § 5. and there are democratic institutions. 25
- § 6. This theory of the moral principle is preferable to those of Perfection, Moral Law, Reason and Benevolence. 32

THE PRINCIPLE IN INSTITUTIONS

- § 1. All institutions have moral importance so far as they bring men into friendly co-operation. 45
- § 2. Many institutions are directly moral; 52
- § 3. among which ought to be government. 64
- § 4. There ought also to be literary and artistic institutions of a moral character. 68

CHAPTER THREE	PAGE 74
THE PRINCIPLE IN THE VIRTUES
§ 1. The working of the principle can be illustrated by reviewing the virtues. The earliest are the tribal;	74
§ 2. later come the domestic,	82
§ 3. the political,	84
§ 4. and the international.	87
§ 5. Religion is virtuous so far as it contains an element of valuation.	90
§ 6. A fully virtuous moral agent must also be criti- cal. The best criterion is one derived from the principle of human value.	97
CHAPTER FOUR	105
CULTURAL INTERESTS
§ 1. Cultural interests are motivated by a kind of appreciation of man. This is very evident in regard to art and literature;	105
§ 2. and true, though less evident, in regard to science.	112
§ 3. Cultural interests are encouraged by the same conditions that favour good morality.	116

THE HIGHER INDIVIDUALISM

- | | |
|--|-----|
| § 1. Virtue also includes a kind of individualism,
the main factor in which is pride. | 120 |
| § 2. It is needed especially by members of the leading class, which tends therefore to get out of touch with the mass of the people. | 123 |
| § 3. But the leading class must degenerate, if it gets out of touch too far. | 132 |
