

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I

THE ETERNAL SOCIETY

Society—the earliest already governed by an ideal (1). Progress of civilisation, tests of. Labour and repose (2–3). The individual and society: difficulties and advantages of elementary forms of society: relationships few and simple: significance of parts in and for the whole more easily perceived than in a later and more elaborate society. Loss of unity and causes of this; both in the individual and in society itself (3–7). Variety and confusion. The separation of interest from interest (8). The recovery of unity, and the remaking of society. The spirit of man (9–10).

CHAPTER II

EDUCATION—THE MAKING OF SOCIETY AND ITS MEMBERS

Education the process by which men discover themselves: other accounts of education (12). Education, scientific and humane: the value and the danger of this distinction (13, 14). Specialisation and specialists (15). Variety and concentration (16). A man and his neighbours (18). Education and instruction (19). Analogy between society and the individual (22). Self-realisation and escape from self (23). The busy man (24). Distracting duties; society, the temporal and the eternal.

CHAPTER III

AGENTS AND PROCESSES

The safeguarding of the young (28). Parents unable to give the care and the time needed (29). They therefore employ deputies—caretakers or teachers (29, 30). This delegation of parental work to other persons dictated not only by economic necessity. The claims of society upon parents contrasted, yet to be reconciled with those of the young (32). The family and the child (33). The removal of the child from parents and family (35). Caretakers, or teachers, are not only deputies for parents, but servants of society. School and nursery; rich and poor (37).

CONTENTS

CHAPTER IV

NATURE AND DISCIPLINE

Caretaking further described: control and suggestion (40, 41). Exercise. Wild animals, tame animals, and children compared (43, 44). Preparation for life, and "breaking-in." Nature and second nature (45). Freedom and convention: the protection of society, and the protection of children—against themselves (47). Play; its uses. The conservation of children (50). Children must live—and let live (51). The open road, and the main road (52). Fellow travellers, and inns (53).

CHAPTER V

CONVERSATION WITH THE WORLD

Speech and subjects of speech (54–55): new language for new experience; new meanings for familiar words (56–59); teaching—the art of interpretation (61). Life, consists not in a multitude of possessions (63–64). Loneliness—a mode of relationship (65). Self-sufficiency and the recognition of society (66). Means and matters for communication (67).

CHAPTER VI

LIFE AND LANGUAGE

Commerce in things and in ideas (68–69). The discovery of the world, of oneself (70–71). The teacher helps in this discovery (73–74). Home and the world (75). The citizen of the world (76). The narrowness of the professional (77–78). Honest trespassing (79). The "curriculum" drawn by a poet.

CONTENTS

ix

CHAPTER VII

SUBJECTS OF DISCOURSE

Man creates his gods and claims for himself a world as large as he assigns to them (82–83). The language of religion—justified (83–84). “The curriculum”—the race-course, the training stable; the world, the high-road and the school (85–86). Preparation for life—and for earning a living—the responsibility and the power of the school for both (87–90). “General” and “vocational” education (91–92). Education of many grades, but of one kind: scholarship and business (94–96).

CHAPTER VIII

SCIENCE AND SCIENCES

Complaints made against the teacher—their number and variety evidence of the consideration paid to him (97–98). But these complaints are often unjust—it is not the teacher who decides what is to be taught (98–101). Science and sciences—the demand for—its meaning, and its meaninglessness (102–103). Men of science compared with flowers (104). Organisation—our distaste for: its proper significance (105–107). System in education: the dangers of specialisation (110–111). The unifying power of belief (112).

CHAPTER IX

WORK AND PLAY

Claims nowadays made for freedom and “individuality”: difficulty of understanding what these words mean (113–114). Professor Nunn on the “Spirit of Play” (115–116). Work and play (118–119). Difference between them (120). “Freedom” and “spontaneity” (122). Protection involves restraint (123).

CHAPTER X

ORIGINALITY AND CONVENTION

What must be and what may be (125). The seriousness of infancy and childhood (126–127). We learn the meaning of play when we learn the need of work (128–129). Self-discovery (130). Scales

Cambridge University Press
 978-1-107-58591-1 - Society and Solitude
 E. T. Campagnac
 Table of Contents
More information

x

CONTENTS

of value inherited, discovered and used (133). The true grammarian (135). Experimentation and originality (136-139). To save labour is to save time (140-141). Leisure and the mastery of instruments: technique and play (142-143).

CHAPTER XI

OURSELVES AND OUR NEIGHBOURS

Our neighbours—other than ourselves: but to be understood (144-145); and used, but on the condition of understanding them better (146-147). Egotism, blameless and bad (148): Familiarity, and dullness: strangeness and newness (151). Self-interest (152). Class-distinctions; their value; corresponding to functions (153-154). Grades and orders of merit; unifying oneself (155). Differences devised for the sake of an intelligible and tolerable unity (156-157).

CHAPTER XII

UNITY AND DIFFERENCE

Every man has his place; but some places are more desired than others (158-159). A man's value in relation to his place, and his value as a man (160-161). The distribution of places: Plato on place or function (164). The best places not the easiest to fill: asceticism demanded of men who are to fill the best places (164-166). Self-sacrifice and self-realisation: unconscious perfection (168-169). Mechanical and intelligent co-operation (170-174). A heavenly tedium (174). Speech the instrument of analysis and of reconstruction (175-177).

CHAPTER XIII

ARTISTS AND MEN

Art and convention; Fashion and fashions; Faith and faiths (178-179). Extraordinary ordinariness: "a young man of lively parts" (180-181). The artist—the egotist (184-185). The penalty of egotism (186-187). The plain man—his breadth of view and variety of experience. The claim of the artist, how sustained. He seeks immortality, and wins it at the price of death (187-188).

CONTENTS

xi

CHAPTER XIV

THE TEACHER'S ART

Artists and players—professional players and gentlemen (189–191). The respectable amateur, and the would-be Bohemian. The concentration of the artist upon his task (192). Self-consciousness and disease; delicacy and health. The great vocation (194). The teacher an artist: arraigned as a fanatic and a tyrant, and often tempted to be both. Escape from these dangers (195–196). The teacher a creator—in what sense. The condition on which he traffics with the world.

CHAPTER XV

IMPRISONMENT AND FREEDOM

The present demand for education prompted by the desire for conversation, for entrance into the human society (199–200). Society and the best society: an educated society (201). Excellence won by limitation; resentment against limitation (203–206). Leisure and learning—and wisdom (208). Leisure and vacuity (212). Isolation and a common humanity (213).

CHAPTER XVI

SILENCE, MEDITATION AND PAIN

Emancipation (214). The language of parables (215). Destiny and vocation: vocation surpassed (216–217). Governor and governed (218–221). The fruits of education (222). Goodness uses knowledge and skill as instruments; but makes them more than instruments by absorbing them in itself (224). Listening to silence; the practice of meditation (225). Pain, suffered willingly and intelligently, hastens the coming of a new and unified society (226).