Electrified Democracy

The story of how the UK Parliament came to use the Internet from the 1960s onwards has never been told. Electrified Democracy places the impact of technology on parliamentary workings in its longer-term historical context. The author identifies repeating patterns of perception and analysis, and cultural tendencies in the perception of inventions dating back over centuries that have reasserted themselves in connection with the parliamentary response to networked computers. He uncovers evidence and makes new connections while situating all this within the wider global debates on connections between communication and democracy in the age of the Internet, constitutional law and history, and ‘law and technology’. This book will be of interest to a wide readership including policymakers, researchers and all those interested in contemporary controversies about the role of the Internet in modern societies.

Andrew Blick is Reader in Politics and Contemporary History and Head of the Department of Political Economy at King’s College London. He has extensive experience of working inside political institutions, including the United Kingdom Parliament, and has written widely on constitutional matters.

Since 1970, the Law in Context series has been at the forefront of a movement to broaden the study of law. The series is a vehicle for the publication of innovative monographs and texts that treat law and legal phenomena critically in their cultural, social, political, technological, environmental and economic contexts. A contextual approach involves treating legal subjects broadly, using materials from other humanities and social sciences, and from any other discipline that helps to explain the operation in practice of the particular legal field or legal phenomena under investigation. It is intended that this orientation is at once more stimulating and more revealing than the bare exposition of legal rules. The series includes original research monographs, coursebooks and textbooks that foreground contextual approaches and methods. The series includes and welcomes books on the study of law in all its contexts, including domestic legal systems, European and international law, transnational and global legal processes, and comparative law.

As usual, I have accumulated various debts in the writing of this book. The first is to Finola O’Sullivan, Marianne Nield, and the team at Cambridge University Press for their support, including during the difficult completion period in a time of global pandemic. The second is to my colleagues at the Department of Political Economy and elsewhere in King’s College London. The third is to the international network of historians linked to the History & Policy initiative. It was under this banner that I worked with Dr Jennifer Doyle on a literature review on the subject of printing and Parliament. The fourth is to the group of constitutionally fascinated people surrounding the Constitution Society, at which Emily Barrett worked with me on research into the contemporary Internet. The fifth is to the assorted parliamentarians, parliamentary clerks, and other internet users with whom I have discussed and worked on the issues covered in this book over the years. The sixth – and as ever – is my family: my parents, Karen Blick and Robin Blick, and my sister, Katharine Blick. The three people who have to bear the most are of course my two sons, Frederick Blick and George Blick, and my wife Nicola Blick.
