VOLUME X

International Law at the Time of the League of Nations
(1920–1945)

Volume X of The Cambridge History of International Law offers a comprehensive and critical discussion of the history of international law in the interwar period to date. Bringing together scholars across various disciplines, the volume aims to go beyond the well-established cliché of the failure of the League of Nations and discusses the huge impact this period had on the post-Second World War international legal order. It focuses on the League of Nations as an important milestone to be studied, analysed and understood in its own right. Using a global perspective, the volume sheds light on the different branches of international law in this dynamic period, during which the discipline underwent a qualitative leap.

RANDALL LESAFFER is Professor of Legal History at KU Leuven in Belgium and Tilburg University in the Netherlands. He is the author of European Legal History: A Cultural and Political Perspective and co-editor of The Cambridge Companion to Hugo Grotius. He is the editor-in-chief of the book series Studies in the History of International Law, an editor of the Global Law series and an editor of the Journal of the History of International Law.

ROBERT KOLB is Professor of Public International Law at the University of Geneva. He is a former legal staff member of the ICRC, and a member of the International Humanitarian Law section at the High Command of the Swiss Army. He has written extensively on international law.

MOMCHIL MILANOV is an Associate Legal Officer of the International Court of Justice and studies public international law at the University of Geneva. His research interests include the history and theory of international law, law and literature, international procedural law, dispute settlement, as well as nationality and citizenship.
