

The Psychology of Poverty Alleviation

In order to design, enact, and protect poverty alleviation policies in developing countries, we must first understand the psychology of how the poor react to their plight, and not just the psychology of the privileged called upon for sacrifice. This book integrates social and psycho-dynamic psychology, economics, policy design, and policy-process theory to explore ways to follow through on successful poverty-alleviation initiatives, while averting destructive conflict. Using eight case studies across Latin America, Southeast Asia, and South Asia, William Ascher examines successes and failures in helping the poor through affirmative action, cash transfers, social-spending targeting, subsidies, and regional development. In doing so, he demonstrates how social identities, attributions of deservingness, and perceptions of the policy process shape both the willingness to support pro-poor policies and the conflict that emerges over distributional issues.

WILLIAM ASCHER is Donald C. McKenna Professor of Government and Economics at Claremont McKenna College.

Acknowledgments

This book grew out of a four-year-long working group at Claremont McKenna College. Impressive background research was conducted by Aleena Ali, Hannah Bottum, Audrey Breitwieser, Brian Chmelik, Byron Cohen, Syed Farooq, Sydney Flynn, Tania Alicia Gray, Michael Grouskay, Sydney Joseph, Katherine Krey, Isabel Laterzo, Chenyu Li, Xinzhu Li, Andrea Medina, Charlotte Reinnoldt, Paola Salomon, Tania Salomon, and Sanjana Sankaran. I am especially grateful for the research by Alejandra Vazquez Baur on Afro-Brazilian affirmative action, by Lauren Giurata on ideological polarization in Argentina, and by Shambhavi Sahai on affirmative action in India. Reactions by Robert Healy, Jin Sato, Lars Schoultz, and Aseema Sinha to earlier drafts were extremely helpful. Finally, hundreds of conversations with Barbara Hirschfelder-Ascher about the theories and cases, as well as her editing of dozens of versions, made this book possible.
